Reid, John, M.D., 1809-1849, a native of Bathgate, Limithgowshire, Scotland; educated at the University of Edinburgh; M.D., 1830; Demonstrator of Anatomy at Edinburgh; M.D., 1830; Demonstrator of Anatomy at Old Surgeons' Hall, Edinburgh, 1833-36; Lecturer on Physiology at the Extra-Academical Medical School, Physiology at the Extra-Academical Science, Science, Bdinburgh, 1836; Pathologist to the Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh, 1838; Chandes Prof. of Anatomy and Medicino, Univ. of St. Andrew's, 1841-49. He died of a cancer of the tongue, after more than eighteen months' sufferings, endured with Christian fortifude. He was a contributor to the Annals and Magazine of Natural History, and to a number of scientific journals. was allured from the theological studies which were preparing him for the pulpit, by the thirst for adventure and the desire for fereign travel. In 1838 he visited the city of New Orleans, and from thence made several hunting and trading excursions among the Indians of the Red River country and those of Missouri, gaining that knowledge of scenery, manners, and characteristics which he has since used to such advantage in his Scalp-Hunters, White Chief, and some others of his romances. More than five years were spent on the prairies and in rapid tours of observation in almost all of the Western, Southern, and Northern States. Subsequently settling in Philadelphia, he contributed largely to the periodicals of that city and those of New York. On the breaking out of the Mexican war, in 1845, he obtained a commission in the army of the United States, and served with distinction "throughout the campaign." In 1849 he sailed from New York, at the head of a body of volunteers, for the purpose of aiding the Hungarians in their struggle for freedom. At Paris the party was arrested by the unwelcome intelligence of the defeat of the Hungarian army of the South, August 9, and the extinction of all hope by the surrender of Görgei at Arad, August 14. Captain Reid now settled in London, and produced with great rapidity a series of novels and juvenile works which have made him a favourite author with all ages. The artistic adjuncts which illustrate the text of volumes have doubtless contributed to the triumphs of the author's graphic pen. List of his publications: 1. Reid, Thomas, D.D., April 26, 1710-Oct. 7, 1796, Kingardineshire. Scotland, of the same family as the preceding, and the son of the Rev. same asminy as the preceding, and the son of the Rev. Lewis Reid, at the age of twelve or thirteen became a student of Marischal College, Aberdeen, and was subsequently appointed to the librarianship, a post which he resigned in 1736. In 1737 he was presented by King's College, Aberdeen, to the living of New Machar, Aberdeenshire, where his amiable temper and faithful labours soon overcame the opposition of his people to an ap-peintment which the law of patronage made repugnant to their feelings. At this time he had so little confidence in his powers of composition that he was in the habit of edifying his hearers with the sermons of Archbishop Tillotson and Dr. Evans.

In 1740 his loneliness was relieved by his marriage to Blisabeth, the daughter of his uncle, Dr. George Reid, a London physician, and about the same time he was led to an anxious investigation of those great problems in mental and moral philosophy which had become almost bupelessly obscured by the unhappy speculations of sophists who had too long been permitted to "darken counsel by words without knowledge."

His first publication, inserted in the Philosophical Transactions in 1748, and since frequently printed with other works of his, was an Essay on Quantity, occasioned by reading a Treatise in which Simple and Compound Ratios are applied to Virtue and View. In this paper he combats the application of mathematics to morals, contended for by Francis Hutcheson in his Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue.

In 1752 he was elected Professor of Moral Philosophy in King's College, Aberdeen, in 1763 pub. his Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense, (London, 8vo,) and in the same year was called to the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, vacated by the resignation of Adam Smith. This important office he filled with great reputation until his seventy-first year, retiring in 1781 to the undisturbed enjoyment of the society of his books, the domestic circle, and his literary friends.

In 1773 he pub., as an Appendix to the third vol. of Lord Kames's Sketches of the History of Man, An Analysis of Aristotle's Logic, (since frequently reprinted with other works of Reid's;) contributed to the Philosophical Society of Glasgow An Examination of Priestley's Opinions concerning Matter and Mind, Observations on the Utopia of Sir Thomas More, Physiological Reflections on Muscular Motion, and other papers; pub. in 1785, Edinburgh, 4to, Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man; and in 1788, 4to, Essays on the Active Powers of Man. The last two were republished together, Dubin, 1790, 3 vols. 8vo. After his retirement, he was greatly affected by the loss of his wife, after a union of fifty-two years. In the summer of 1796 he spent a few weeks at Ediuburgh, in the company of his friend, former pupil, biographer, and most distinguished scholar, Dugald Stewart; on his return to Glusgow, in September, he us prostrated by sickness, and died on the 7th of October following, after repeated strokes of palsy.

His personal character was well calculated to gain the respect and affection of his acquaintances:

"Dr. Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind was the first direct attack which appeared in Scotland upon the sceptical conclusions of Mr. Hume's philosophy. For my own opinion of this work I must refer to one of my former publications, [Memoir of Reid, ut supra.] It is enough to remark here that its great object is to refute the Ideal Theory, which was then in complete possession of the schools, and upon which Dr. Reid conceived that the whole of Berkeloy's reasonings against the existence of matter was founded. . . On the refutation of the ideal theory, contained in this and his other work, Dr. Reid was disposed to rest his chief merit as an author."—DUGALD STEWART: First Prefix. Dissert to Encyc. Brit., 218.

From the many learned opinions before us of the pecu-Harities and morits of Reid's philosophical tenets, our quotations must needs be few in number and brief in one—of his services to philosophy:

First let us hear Reid's own estimate-

-of his services to philosophy:

"The merit of what you are pleased to call my Philosophy les, I think, chiefly in having called in question the common theory of ideas or images of things in the mind being the only histor of thought; a theory founded on natural projudices, and my universally received as to be intervoeven with the structure
I language. Fut were I to give you a detail of what led me to call in question this theory, after I had long held it as selfevideat and unquestionable, you would think, as I do, that there was much of chance in the matter. The discovery was the birth of time, not of genius; and Berkeley and Itune did more to bring it to light than the man that hit upon it. I think there is lardly any thing that can be called sake in the philosophy of the mind, which does not follow with ease from the dereceiven of this projudice."—Ladier to Dr. Jumes Gregory: Reid's Works, Hamilton's ed., 38.

We continue our quotations:

The author of an Inquiry into the Mind, and of subsequenty Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man, has great merit in the effect to which he has pursued this history. But, considering the point at which the science stood whom he began his inquiries, he has perhaps no less merit in having removed the mist of hypothesis and interphor with which this subject the mist of hypothesis and interphor with which this subject the mist of hypothesis and interphor with which this subject the facts of which we are conscious, not in figurative larguage, but in the terms which are proper to the subject. In this it will be our advantage to follow him; the more that, in former theories, so much attention had been paid to the introduction of ideas or magaze as the clements of knowledge, that the belief of any external existence or prototype has been left to be inferred from the mere also or image; and this inference, indeed, is so little founded, that many who have come to examine its sydonce have thought themselves warranted to deny it altogether. And there the criticism of ingenious men, who, not seeing a proper access of knowledge through the medium of ideas, without considering whether the road they had been directed to take was the true or a take one, denied the possibility of arriving at the end."—Dr. Adan Ferguson: Prin. of Moral and Political Science, vol. 1.

This estimate will hardly be admitted without controversy. An eminent critic, already cited, remarks of Pascal,

"His philosophical glances are wonderful. The summary of arguments for scepticism and dogmatism, especially the latter, is perhapt the best in neighbor modern philosophy. The last contains, in a single page, the whole system of Dr. Reid; and it is but little toach that it contains in the first sentence (Unique for these Dogmatistes elect qu'en parlant de bonne foi, on ne peut douter des principes naturels) the whole book of Dr. Benttle,"—Sir J. Mackintoshi: Journal, 1808, Life, vol. i., chin. viii. ch.p. viii.

"Dr. Roid's great achievement was, undoubtedly, the subversion of the ideal system, or the confutation of that hypothesis which represents the immediate objects of the mind in perception as certain manyes or pictures of external objects convoyed by the senses to the sensorium. This part of his task it is now generally admitted that he has performed with exemplary diligence and complete sure ose; but we are by no means so entirely satisfied with the uses he has attempted to make of his victory."

"The great aim of Reid's philosophy, then, was to investigate the true theory of perception; to controvert the representationalist hypothesis, as held in one sense or another by almost all preceding philosophers; and to stay the progress which scopiels, anded by this hypothesis, was so rapidly making....
That Reid has done much for the advancement of mental science, is almost universally admitted to complain that he did not accomplish more, or follow out the track which ho opened to its furthest results, is perhaps unreasonable; since we ought rather to look for the completion of his labours from the bands of his followers, than domain from humself at once the foundation and the super-structure."—Morell's Hist. of Mod. "La philosophie de Reid et de l'école écossaise est une philosophie sophic du sens commun; elle n'est susceptible d'sucune autre définition; elle n'est ni sensualisto, ni réfischie, ni rationaliste; elle participe de chacun de ces aystòmes pour autans qu'its s'accordent avec le sens commun, mais elle-néme forme moins un système, dont toutes les parties soient liées par un principe organique, qu'un ensemble de vôrités détachées dont toute le daison consiste dans leur conformité aux décrets du bon sens.

"Cette plulosophie a d'incontextables mérites; elle a reconne un grand mombre de vérités premières qui avaient été trop souvent niées ou absorbées dans les vues systématiques des doctrines antérieures; telles sont, par exemple, la distinction réelle de l'esprit et du corps, l'activité de l'âme à tous les dégrés de lu connaissance, la nature diverse de la connaissance sensible ou contingente et de la comnais-ance rationelle on nécessaire, et les principes ou les axiomes de la philosophie. Reld a ainsi sanctionné, par l'opinion commune, la vérité relative du sensulisme et de leures caractères exclusits. Mais, au lieu de s élever à un point de vue supérieur qui domine à la fois le sensunlisme et la rationalisme pur, qui les complète l'une l'autre et les transforme dans la dort une harmonique de la science, il se place à un point de vue inférieur, où ces ductrines opposées se rence au point de vue, non de la ratson absolue, mais du sens commun."—Essaithéorique et historique sur lu Génération des Connaissence humaines, par Therghien, Bruxelles, 1841: vide Blakey's Hist. of the Philos. of Mind, Lon. 1850, ib. 634-635. "It may be here remarked that what Malebranche has properly called the judgment of the mind as to the came of its sensations, is precisely what Rend denominates perception; a term less clear, and which seems to have led some of his school into important errors. The language of the Scottish philosopher appears to imply that he considered perception as a distinct and original faculty of the mind, rather than

tion of his master's doctrine of Perception:

and of his mis-fer's doctrine of Ferception;

"To what then, it may be asked, does the statement amount?
Merely to this: that the mud is so formed that certain impressions produced on our organs of sense by external objects are followed by correspondent sensations, and that these sensations (which have no more resemblance to the qualities of matter than the words of a language have to the things they denote are followed by a perception of the existence and qualities of the bodies by which the impressions are made; that all the steps of this process are equally incomprehensible; and that, for any thing we can prove to the contrary, the connection between the sonby which the impressions are made; that all the steps of this process are equally incomprehensible; and that, for any thing we can prove to the confarry, the connection between the sontation and the perception, as well as that between the maniform and the sensation may be both arbitrary; that it is therefore by no means impossible that our sensations may be merely the occasions on which the correspondent perceptions are excited; and that, at any rate, the consideration of these sensations, which are attributes of mund, can throw no light on the manner in which we acquire our knowledge of the existence and qualities of body. From this view of the subject it follows that it is the external objects themselves, and not any species or images of the objects, that the mind perceives; and that, although by the constitution of our nature certain sensations are rendered the constant antec dents of our perceptions, yet it is just as difficult to explain how our perceptions are obtained by their means, as it would be upon the supposition that the mind were all at once inspired with them, without any concomitant sensations whatever. —Sevarie Works, it. 111, 112.

But Reid's doctrine of Perception has been most strangely misunderstood and misrepresented by his later commentators, as is conclusively shown by the latest and commentators, as is conclusively shown by the latest and the greatest. To his annotations the student has already been referred; but we shall oblige him by quoting a few lines which bear directly upon the point under considera-

lines which bear directly upon the point under consideration:

"Dr. Reid has many merits as a speculator, but the only morit which he arrogates to himself—the principal merit accorded to him by others—is that he was the first philosopher, in more recent times, who dared, in his doctrine of immediate porception, to vindicate, against the unanimous authority of philosophers, the universal conviction of mankind. But this doctrine he has at best imperfectly developed, and, at the same time, has unfortunately obscured it by errors of so singular a character that some acute philosophers—for Dr. Brown does not stand slone [Priestley, Gleig, Beasley, and others are subsequently named; videp. 208]—have never even suspected what his doctrine of perception actually is. In my last Lecture, [XXXII], having concluded the review of Reid's Historical Account of Opinions on Perception, and of Brown's Attack upon that account, isee Brown's Lects, on the Philos. of the Human Mind, Lects. XXV, XXVI.,] I proceeded to the question.—Is Reid's own doctrine of perception a scheme of Natural Realism't that is, did he accept in its integrity the dictum of consciousness,—that we are immediately cognitive both of the phenomens of matter and of the phenomens of mind; or did he, like Brown, and the greater number of more recent philosophers, as Brown assumed, hold only the finer form of the ropresentative hypothesis, which supposes that, in perception, the external reality is not the immediate object of consciousness, but that the ego is only determined in some unknown manner to represent the non-ego, which representation, though only a modification of mind, or self, we are sempelled by an filusion of our nature, to mistake for a modification of mind, or self, we are sempelled by an filusion of our nature, to mistake for a modification of mind, or self, we are sempelled by an filusion of our nature, to mistake for a modification of mind, or self, we are

cation of matter, or not-self I stated to you how on the determination of this question depended nearly the whole of Reid's philosophical reputation; his philosophy professes to subvert the foundations of idealism and sceptician, and it is as having accomplished what he thus attempted, that any principal or peculiar glory can be awarded to him. But if all he did was merely to explode the cruder hypothesis of representation, and to adopt in its place the finer,—why, in the first place, so far from depriving idealism and sceptician of all basis, he only placed them on one firmer and more obscure; and, in the second, so far from originating a new opinion, he could only have added one to a class of philosophers who, after the time of Arnauld, were continually on the increase, and who, among the contemporaries of Reid himself, cortainly constituted the majority. His philosophy would thus be at once a silly blunder; its pretence to originality only in proclamation of ignorance; and, so for from being an honour to the nation from which it arose and by whom it was respected, it would, in fact, be a scandid and a repreach to the an honour to the nation from which it arose and by whom it was respected, it would, in fact, be a scandal and a reproach to the philosophy of any country in which it met with any milder treatment than derision. . . I then detailed to you the grounds on which it ought to be held that Rold's doctrine of Perception is one of Natural Realism, and not a form of Cosmothetic Idealism, as supposed by Brown. . . Having concluded the argument by which I endeavoured to satisfy you that Realism (as the analysis of the second edition) and the philosophical doctrine than Hypothetical Realism—Sir Wm. Hamilton's Lects. on Metaphysics, Lects. X111., XXIV., Bost., 1859, 155, 327, 329.

Bost., 1859, 155, 327, 329.

In the second edition (1857) of his Biographical History of Philosophy, Mr. Lewes remarks,
"Since the first edition of this work, Sir W. Hamilton has published an edition of Reid, illustrated and enriched by notes and dissertations of incomparable crudition and acuteness, Respecting the interpretation Sir William gives to Reid's decritics, I will only say that he has shown what a subtle mind can read into the philosophy of common sense; but he has not in the least produced the conviction in me of Reid's having meant what the illustricus successor supposed him to have meant. At the same time, I will add that, the limits of my work having restricted me to the consideration of Reid's contributions to Philosophy, (in the narrow sense of the term,) I have not done justice to his many excellent qualities as a teacher. His works are well worthy of diligent study, and their spirit is eminently scientific."—p. 629.

Surely the perplexed tyro may well ask, with the doubter of old, "What is truth?" Stewart labours with doubter of old, "what is train?" Stewart theours with the friendly seal of a disciple and a convert to enable, us to understand Reid; Priestley, Gleig, Beasley, and Brown endeavour to prove that Reid did not understand himself; Sir William Hamilton says that these scute phllosophers "have never even suspected what Reid's doctrine actually is;" and now Mr. Lewes avows his disbelief of Reid's baving meant what Sir William Hamilton "supposed him to have meant"! Our own discretion in referring the reader to Reid himself, and to his commentators, instead of attempting to present a synopsis of his philosophy ourselves, will hardly be questioned.

We know not what the reader will think of us when we add to the above that the "chaste and simple diction"

we add to the above that the "chaste and simple diction" of Reid has been commended to the imitation of the student; but a moment's thought will suffice to satisfy us that these qualities of style are not inconsistent with obscurity of sentiment. Whether, however, "the case, perspicuity, and purity of style" which Mr. Stewart claims for his "guide, philosopher, and friend" will be so readily allowed, we leave to the decision of the reader. It will readily be believed, again to quote Sir William, that that

"There is a great want of precision in Reid's account of Per-ception and Servation. . . . Reid cannot escape censure for am-liguity and vagueness."—Lects. on Metaphyrics, Lect. XXIV.

Sir William well remarks,

Sir William well remarks,

"That Reid, a distinguished philosopher, and even the founder of an illustrious school, could be as greatly misconcived as that an eminent disciple [Dr. Brown] of that as hool itself should actually reverse the fundamental principle of his doctring—this may excite your wonder, but it ought not to move you to disparage either the talent of the philosopher misconceived or on the permanent importance, not only in speculation, but in practice, of pracise thinking. You ought never to rest content, so long as there is aught vague or indefinite in your reasonings,—so long as to have not analyzed every notion into its elements, and excluded the possibility of all lurking ambiguity in your expressions. One great, perhaps the one greatest, advantage resulting from the cultivation of Philosophy, is the habit it induces of vigorous thought; that is, of allowing nothing to pass without a searching examination, either in your own speculations, or in those of others. We may never, perhaps, arrive at truth, but we can always avoid self-contradiction.—

16dd. Lect. XXIII. 325.

"In comparing Dr. Reid's publications at different periods of the life, it is interesting to observe his growing partiality for the aphoristical style. Some of his 'Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man' are little more than a series of detached paragraphs, consisting of leading thoughts, of which the roader is left to trace the research.

Also, Geographical Illustrations of Mr. Park's Journey and of North Africa at Large, 1798, 4to. 11. The Geographical System of Herodotus Examined and Explained by a Comparison with those of other Ancient Authors and with Modern Geography, &c., 1800, Ito. Pub. at £2 2s., and sometimes sold for £7 to £8 8s., until superseded by a second ed., Revised, pub. by his daughter, Lady Rodd, 1830, (some 1831,) 2 vols. 8vo, £1 8s. This is indeed a work of wonderful work. So, and I will be in the second that the author, from his ignorance of Greek, was dependent on the inaccurate (though often elegant) version of Beloc, pub. 1791, 1806, 1812, 1822. each ed. in 4 vols. Svo; again, 1831, 3 vols. 8vo; 1831, 8vo; see Brior, William, pp. 162, 163, supra. Respecting Rennell's labours, see London Jour, of Education, i. 330; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 141; Lon. Mon. 14. Comparative Geography of Western Asia, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo, and Atlas, fol. Posth. 15. Investigation of the Currents of the Atlantic Ocean, and of those which prevail between the Indian Ocean and the Atlantic, 1832, two. Posth. Pub. by Lady Rodd. This work gives us 8vo. Posth. the results of the collation of the log-hooks of many of the ships of war and Indiamen which had ploughed these great waters during the preceding thirty or forty years. The Wind and Current Charts and Sailing Directions of Dr. Maury (vide p. 1249, supra) have super-seded Rennell's investigations.

Major Rennell also contributed valuable geographical and other papers to Phil. Traus., 1781, '91, '93, 1809, '15; Ric. Jour., 1798, (see Watt's Bibl. Brit.;) the Asiatio Researches and Register; and the Trans. of the Royal and Antiquarian Society. See Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1830, 561, (Obituary;) Life of Sir J. Mackintosh. vol. ii. shap. ii., Journal, Aug. 24, 1811. The testimony of Gibbon to the eminent merits of our author has been cited above; and the reader may remember another quotation from the historian, on the same subject, in our life of from the historian, on the same subject, in our life of John Pinkerton. To that article we also refer him for the titles of many valuable works on Travels, Voyages, and Geography. We have imagined the delight with which Rennell would peruso Rawlinson's Herodotus: how greatly, also, would be have enjoyed a few days and hights given to the grand geographical collection of Rart Ritter, (just deceased,) at this moment (May, 1860) offered for sale at Berlin!

Rennell, Thomas, D.D., 1754-1840, grandson of the preceding: educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge; became curate of Barnack, and, in 1771, Prob. of Winchester, (resigned, 1797;) Rector of St. Magnus, London Bridge, 1792; Master of the Temple, 1797-1827; Denn of Winchester, 1805; Rector of Alton, Units 1806. Victor of Rector Steams Hants, 1809; Vicar of Barton Stacey, Hants, 1814. 1786 he married the eldest daughter of Sir William Blackstone. He pub. a number of single Sermons, Lon., 1793-98, and in 1801 fourteen of his Discourses on Various Subjects were pub. collectively in an octavo volume. His Sermon on Gaming, 1794, 8vo, was commended in Pursuits of Lit. (Dial. III., Note 38) as "written with great energy, erudition, piety, patriotism, and eloquence;" and the same severe critic eulogizes his Sermon on the Services rendered to the English Nation by the Church of England, 1796, Svo, as very able, learned, and eloquent, (Dial. IV., Note 160.) In 1798 his Commencement Sermon, (Ignorance productive of Athelem, &c.,) in which he exposed the true character of the French Revolution, gained for him from Mr. Pitt the title of "The Demosthenes of the Pulpit." The Rev.

title of "The Demosthenes of the Pulpit." The Rev. Sydney Smith, who reviewed his vol. of Sermons, (1801, 8vo.) in the Edin. Rev., Oct. 1802, (repub. in Smith's Miscell. Works, ed. 1854, i. 10-19.) whilst praising his Sermon on Gaming, blames him "for having sedected for publication so many sermons touching directly and indirectly upon the French Revolution. We confoss ourselves long succe wearied with this kind of discourses, bespattered with blood and brains, and ringing eternal changes upon athesian, cannibalism, and apostasy. . Dr. Rennell is apt to put on the appearance of a holy bully, an evangelical swaggerer, as if he could carry his point against infidelity by bug words and strong abuse, and kick and cut men into Christianity"—pp. 87-84

There has also been pub. Selections from the Works of Bishop Reynolds, with a Portrait and a Brief Sketch of his Life, by William Wilson, D.D., 18mo. We have already quoted (see MILNER, JOSEPH, No. 2) Mr. Bickersteth's enthusiastic culogy on Reynolds's Sermons: we add a few lines to the same effect;

"Of the Sermons of Reynolds, in common with those of many other mighty divines of that period, it may also be said that they are luminaries, capable of being 'cut into little stars,' each of which might make a folerably respectable figure in the firma-ment of modern theology,"—Beit, Critic.

"Reynolds's sermons contain extensive learning happily applied, much beauty of illustration, clear statement, and cloquent appeal; they bear the traces, not to be mistaken, of exalted piety and deep anxiety concerning the souls of men."—Lon. Eclee, Rec.

"A person of great authority as well as fame among the men of the Calvinistical persuasion," &c.—Theoras Pierre, D.D.: Introd. to Divine Parity Defended: Athen. Oron., at sepre.
"He is a most claborate water. He has many surprising similes. His style is remarkably keonic. A world of things are gently touched upon, which shew his extensive acquaintance with human nature, as well as great labour. His works contain a judicious collection of Scriptures both in the text and margin."
—Br. Dodridae: Leck, on Preaching.

"He is a writer of great value and deep piety and experience. His acntences are a stonishingly terms and full of matter, and his doctrine is thoroughly evangelical, spiritual, and holy. . . . His works have been lately republished, [1826, ut supra.] They are a great freasure."—Hiskersteit's C.S., 4th ed., 283.

timated above, many more protessing to be his nave histogen the light on American soil:

"This gentleman," remarks an American acquaintance of Mr. Reynolds, in a letter from London, dated March 25, 1450, "should not be judged in the United States from the character of all the books that bear his name. Such a course would be unjust to both his moral and literary character. He informs me that not one in ten of the Transatlantic publications to which his name has been impudently affixed, ever emanated from his nea."

How disgraceful to America that such base forgeries far more criminal than the mere forgery of a signatureshould be justly charged upon any portion of its press!

Reynolds, Sir Joshua, July 16, 1723-Feb 23, 1792 the toun ler of the British School of Painting," a native of Plympton, Devonshire, and the son of the rector of that place, conceived a passion for painting in consequence of the perusal of Jonathan Richardson's havan on the Theory of Painting, studied for two years and a half under Hudson, the principal portrait painter of the day commenced the practice of his profession at his native place, where he made the acquaintance of Captain (afterwards Admiral Lord) Keppel, who proved a tain (afterwards Admiral Lord) Keppel, who proved a m st useful patron, came to London in 1716, and three years later went to Italy, where he remained, a sealous disciple of the ancients, until near the close of 1752; recommenced practice in London, and plied the brush with increasing success, first in St. Martin's Lane, then in Great Newport Street, and subsequently, from 1761 until his death. In Lemester Smare. in 1764, in confunction his death, in Leicester Square, in 1764, in conjunction with Dr Johnson, instituted the Literary Club, chosen

President of the Royal College, and knighted, 1788; Doctor of Laws, Oxford, 1773: Principal Painter-in-Ordinary to the King, 1784. He left about £80,000 in all, (his collection was sold for £16,947 7s. 6d.,) which, as he died a bachelor, was inherited by his niece, Miss as he died a bachelor, was inherited by his nicce, Miss Palmer, who became the wife of the Earl of Inchiquin, subsequently created Marquis of Thomond.

"As to his person, in his stature Sir Joshua Reynolds was rather under the middle size, of a florid complexion, roundish, blunt features, and a lively aspect,—not corputent, though somewhat inclined to it, but extremely active; with manners uncommonly polished and agreeable. In conversation his manner was perfectly natural, simple, and unassuming. He most heartily enjoyed his profession, in which he was both fortunate and flustrious; and I agree with Mr. Malone, who says he appeared to him to be 'the happiest man he had ever known.' He was thoroughly sensible of his rare lot in life, and truly thankful for it; his virtues were blessed with their full reward."—Northeore: Memoir of Reynolds.

Ample details respecting the productions of this great

Ample details respecting the productions of this great painter—details which do not come within the plan of this Dictionary—will be found in the authorities cited this ractionary—will be found in the authornies clied below. His claims to a place in this record are based upon his fifteen Discourses delivered before the Royal Academy; papers Nos. 78, 79, and 82 (the last-named slightly enlarged by Dr. Johnson) in The Idler; some sightly enlarged by Dr. Johnson) in The Idler; some notes (A Commentary) on Mason's translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, 1783, 4to, (see Walpole's Letters, ed. 1861, viii. 170, 187, n.;) a few notes for Johnson's edition of Shukspoare; and Criticisms on the works of the Dutch and Flemish painters, made during a Journey in Flanders and Holland in 1781.

Some of these Discourses were published separately in 4to in 1769 et sequitur ; and seven were issued together in an octavo volume in 1778. His Works, i.e. the writings above enumerated, with an Account of the Author and his Writings by Edmund Malone, were pub. in 1794, 2 vols. 4to; 1797, 2 vols. 4to; 1798, 3 vols. 8vo; 1801. 3 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1809, 3 vols. 8vo; again, (with Memoirs by Joseph Farington - in addition to Life, by Malone—also pub. separately, 1819, 8vo,) 1819, 3 vols. 8vo: again, 1824, 3 vols. 12mo.

"The two chief points which Sir Joshua aims at in his Discourses are to show that excellence in the Fine Arts is the result of paths and study rather than of genus; and that all iseauty, grace, and grandeur are to be found, not in actual nature, but in an idea existing in the nind. On both these points he appears to have fallen into considerable inconsistencies, or very great latitude of expression, so as to make it difficult to know what conclusion to draw from his various reasonings."—Hazitt: Table-Tulk, Second Sories, Essays XV. and XVI.: On Some Inconsistencies in Sir Joshua Reynolds's Discourses.

"Sir Joshua Reynolds has at last sent me his notes, [en Mason's translation of Du Frenno;] they are well written, and I think will be of service to the Art."—Rev. W. Mison to H. Walpole, March 2, 1782: Walpole's Letters, ed. 1861, vin. 187, n.

REYNOLDS THE PAINTER.

As we have already intimated, it is not our business to enter into any claborate examination of the artist; yet a few quotations respecting his pictures, we are persuaded, will be acceptable to all readers—professional or lay.

The sarenstic eulogy that Sir Joshua came off with

"flying colours" had been anticipated by a poetical commentator who drew his inspiration, whilst Reynolds was yet in his youth, from the absence of that which he sought in the artist's canvas:

The art of painting was at first design'd To call the dead, our encestors, to mind; But this same painter has reversed the plan, And makes the picture die before the man."

"Sir Joshua Reynolds is a great painter, but, unfortunately, his colours seldom stand longer than crayons,"—Horace Walpole to Sir H. Mann, April 22, 1776: Letters, ed. 1861, vi. 205. Sec.

also, 211, 314.

Mr. Cotton's Catalogue of Sir Joshua's portraits (vule No. 7, supra) affords, it is alleged, melancholy evidence that the sad effects of the artist's want of chemical skill in compounding colours, thus exhibited in his own day, have been visited in many instances on the third and fourth generations of collectors. (See Athen., March 27, 1888, 407.) But Mr. Phillips has something to say on this head:

this head:

"The colouring of Sir Joshua Reynolds in his best works combines the highest qualities of Correggio and Titiah with the brilliancy and luxuriance of the Durch and the Flemish schools, deprived of their tunidities. The common error that his colours all fail, ought by this time to be entirely effaced. It is too true that this is the case with the colouring of many pictures painted by him during a short period of his life; he thought that he had discovered a mode of rendering colouring more vivid, and employed it without duly considering the chemical qualities of the materials. But he was soon made acquainted with the mistake he had committed, reassumed his durable system with increased beauty and vigour, and continued to employ it till the termination of his valuable labours."—Lects, on Futning, 372. See, also, Lon. Gent. Mag., Sept. 1843, 245, n.

"Upon the whole," remarks one of the most eminent of his associates, "I may apply to the first lebour of my pen the speech of a far superior artist when he surveyed the first productions of his pencil. After twenty some portraits which he had painted in his youth, my friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, acknowledged to me that he was rather hundled than flattered by the comparison with his present works, and that, after much time and study, he had concerved his improvement to be much greater than he found it to have been."—Eow and Ginson, Memoirs of My Lays and Writings: Macellaneous Works, ed. 1837, 59. See, also, 133. The opinion of Burke's great rival will appropriately

"Nor is he |Sir Joshua Reynolds, in his discourse before the Royal Academy in or last before 1783] judicious in quoting Vandyck, who at least specified silks, satins, velvats. Bir Joshua's diapetoes represent clothes, never their materials. Yet more: Vandyck and Sir itedfrey Kneller excelled all painters in hands; Sir Joshua's historical paintings have little of the heroic dignity which an inspired mind breathes into compositions of that class. His mongrantion commonly fails him, and he attempts to hide his want of wings in the unrivalled splendour of his colouring and by the fluck-strewn graces of his execution. He is often defective, even where he might have been expected to colouring and by the thek-sitewn graces of his execution. He is often defective, even where he might have been expected to show the highest excellence; his faces are formal and cold; and the picture seems made up of borrowed fragments which he had been unable to work up into an entire and consistent whole. His single poetic flaures are remarkable for their unaffected case, their elegant simplicity, and the splendom of their colouring... The portraits of Reynolds are equally numerous and excellent; and all who have written of their meetls have swelled their enlogiums by comparing them with the simplicity of Tritisa, the vigour of Rembrandt, and the elegance and delicacy of Vandyke. Certainly in character and expression and in manip case he has never been surpassed. He is always equal, always notice. dyke. Certainly in character and expression and in mainly case he has never been surpassed. He is always equal, always natural, graceful, unaffected. His holdness of posture and his singular freedom of colouring are so supported by all the grace of art, by all the sorcety of skill, that they super natural and noble. Over the meanest head he sheds the halo of dignity; his men are all nobleness, his women all loveliness, and his children all simplicity; yet they are all like the living originals. He had the singular art of summoning the mind unto the face, and making sentiment mingle in the portrait."

ALIAN CUNNISHAM.

"The grace and beauty of Sir Joshua Reynolds's portraits way accomplished greatly at the expense of likeness. Hoppner remarked that even to him it was a matter of surprise that Reynolds could send home portraits with so little resemblance to the originals. This occasioned in his day many of his portraits to be left on his hands, or turned to the walt."—Lon. Gent. Mag., Aug. 1843, 129.

But and alteram partem:
"That the portraits of Reynolds were the bost of all likenesses.
I have no manner of doubt. I know several of his pictures of children, the originals of whom I have seen in middle and old age, and in every instance I could discover much likeness."—

Rich, Claudius James, 1787-1821, a native of the vicinity of Dijon, Burgundy, but carried to Bristol, England, in his infancy, obtained a wide reputation beforce his loth year for his remarkable attainments in Oriental languages. In 1803 he was appointed a cadet in the E. I. Company's service, and shortly afterwards was presented with a writership in the Bombay establishment. He arrived at Bombay September 1, 1807, soon acquired the esteem of his host, Sir James Mackintosh, and the affections of his eldest daughter, and became the son-in-law of the former and husband of the latter on the 22d of the ensuing January. His success with father and daughter is readily accounted for by the following lines from a letter of Sir James's, written shortly after the marriage:

after the marriage:
"He for surpassed our expectations, and we soon considered his wonderful Oriental attainments us the least part of his more. I found him a fair classical scholar, and capable of speaking and writing French and Italian like the best-educated native. With the strongest recommendations of appearance and manner, he joined every elegant accomplishment and over y monly exercise, and combined with them sprit, pleasantry, and feeling. His talents and attainments delighted me so much that I resolved to make him a philosopher."—Life of Sir Janes Mackintosh, I alson will

i, chap, viii,

But the library was occasionally forsaken for the drawing-room, or perhaps rambles by the shores of Colabba, and, as we have seen, the philosopher became a lover.

In the year of his marriage he was appointed the E. I. Company's Resident at Baghdad, and held this post until 1813, (visiting the rains of Babylon in 1811,) when his failing health made a change of scene indispensable. From this date until his death he was principally occupied in travelling in Asia, and collected that valuable mass of information respecting Oriental antiquities which has proved so useful in guiding the late researches of Layard. Mass., whilst residing for some years in Spain, as Amcrican consul, formed a most valuable collection of rare books and manuscripts, chiefly relating to the discovery, early settlement, and infant history of America, and with this stock established himself in London, where his bibliographical scal and scholarship were continually put into requisition for the benefit of authors and other collectors. He found time, however, for the compilation of the following valuable catalogues, which, even at their present high prices, must find a place on the shelves of the bibliographer and historical student.

1. A Catalogue of Books relating principally to America, arranged under the Years in which they were printed, (1500-1700,) Lon., 1832, 8vc, pp. 129, 486 numbers. To some copies he added, A List of Books relating to America, 1493 to 1700, 16 pp. 8vo, which was after-wards reprinted in 4to, double columns, 4 pp. It is sine anno. There was also a second Supplement, 8 pp. 8vo. The three preceding were reprinted in 1846, with a small and turce preceding were reprinted in 1949, with a small addition, under a new title and as the germ of a new work; see No. 6. The two Supplements, with the Prospectus of the Bibliotheca Americana Vetus, were also printed as a Supplement to No. 4. 2. Catalogue of Miscellaneous Books in all Languages, Lon., 1834, 8vo. A Specimen of No. 3 is appended. 3. Bibliotheca American

The Bibliotheca Americana Vetus, of which we have the prospectus above, was ready for publication, but the MS. having above, was ready for publication, but the MS., having been socidentally left in a hackney-coach, was sold as waste paper to a butcher at Gravesend, in the vicinity of Mr. Rich's residence, from whom only a few sheet were rescued. A portion of the contents, however, will be found in-6. Part 1 of Rich and Son's Catalogue for 1848, containing near Two Thousand Books relating 1848, containing near Two Thousand Books relating principally to America.

"Mr. Rich's Catalogues are deservedly cherished by all who feel interested in tracing the rise and progress of the New World since its first discovery by Columbus in 1492."—Träber's 1864, Guide to Amer. Lit., Introduc., xiv.-xvii., q. v. for a fuller notice of these Catalogues: see, also, p. 5.

"All of Rich's Catalogues are important, and eagerly sought for by book-collectors, especially the earlier ones, which have come to be exceedingly scarce. Copies of the four volumes above described [Nos. 1, 3, and Supp. to 5 and 4] have recently bess sold in New York for $50."—Guill's Librarian's Manual, 1858, 60.

See, also, p. 59 for a notice of the collection of a Providence merchant which contains many works unnoticed by Rich and Ternaux. A review of Ternaux's Publications on American History, by A. Young, will be found in N. American Review, July, 1837, 222-230; in which see p. 224 for a notice of No. 1, supra. The date just cited may remind the collector of Antiquitates Americanse, sive Scriptores Septentrionales Rerum Ante-Columbianum in America, ed. C. C. Rafn, (65 sheets, with 18 engravings,) 1837, imp. 4to,—but whither do we tend? The theme—a Catalogue Raisonné of Books on America—is a tempting one; but we have neither time nor space for its treatment. The collector must wait for the happy day that witnesses the publication of Henry Stevens's Bibliographia Americana; or, A Bibliographical Account of the Sources of Early American History, &c.; or for the completion of Mr. Winthrop Sargent (of Philaby Rich and Ternaux. A review of Ternaux's Publicadecount of the Source of Mary American Hatter, 26.; or for the completion of Mr. Winthrop Sargent (of Philadelphia)'s Catalogue of Books on America. (We venture to guess at a title.) In the mean time, let him console himself with our friend Mr. Tribner's Bibliographical himself with our friend Mr. Tribner's Bibliographical Prolegomena (and the works there indicated) prefixed to his Bibliographical Guide to American Literature, London, 1859, 8vo. See, also, N. Amer. Review, vols. i., iii., iiv., vi., for articles on Books relating to America. But, having for the convenience of the bibliographer arranged Mr. Rich's manuals in chronological order, we must now retrace our steps to add that he also published—7. From Mr. Pressott's letter, relected to by Mr. Everett, we regret that our space permits but a few lines only:

"In short, I may truly say, after an intercearse (by correspondence) with him for thirty years, that I have never known any one who, within the range that I have mentioned, works relating to N. and S. America, and Castilian history and liberature generally, was to be compared with him; and when to this we add his uncommon industry, enterprise, and integrity, we must feel that it will be very long before we shall see his like again."

To the collectors of American literature and old English poetry, this is a precious little volume; while the notices of the Bermootheawes' render it of interest to the Shaksperian student. The name of R. Rich is new to poetical bibliographers."—Charlemont's Cut., ut supra.

Let us pause a moment to drop a tear over the melanchely fate of the library of the late Earl of Charlemont, rich in early English and Italian literature, in exquisite specimens of the presses of Caxton, Wynkyn de Worde, Pynson, and their immediate successors, in Irish history and illuminated manuscripts, and in one of the finest copies known of the folio Shakspeare of 1623. The time had at last arrived when these treasures were to be dispersed at last arrived when these treasures were to be dispersed by auction; but on the 29th of June, 1865, a fire de-stroyed the premises of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge, Wellington Street, London, and of 2477 lots of which the Catalogue was composed, only 233 lots, of which some were damaged, appear to have escaped the flames. These 233 were sold at auction, Aug. 11, 1865, 1782 for no less than £4100 3s. 6d. See specimens in Lon. Reader, 1865, ii. 204. This is, indeed, a sad theme, and one that we would gladly bury in oblivion rather than perpetuate but the the state of the s perpetuate, but that the Muse of History is inexorable in her demand for truth.

Hatcher, appeared, under the title of The Description of Britain, translated from Richard of Circucester; with the original treatise De Situ Britanniae; and a Commen-tary on the Itinerary. This is illustrated with two maps; and a fac-simile of the MS. Situ Britanniae was also printed (the Latin text added) in the same volume with Richard of Devizes's Chronicles concerning the Dueds of Richard I., trans. and edited by J. A. Giles, LL.D., 1811, 810; and the Latin text will be found in Dr. J. A. Giles's History of the Ancient Britons, (1817, 2 vols., Svo,) vol. ii. 380. Lastly, the treatise was pub. in the vol. entitled Six Old English Chronicles, of which two are now first translated from the Monkish Latin Originais: Ethelwerd's Chroniele, Asser's Life of Alfred, theoffrey of Monnouth's British History, Gildas, Nennius, and Richard of Circnecster: Edited, with Notes, by J. A. Giles, LL.D., 1848, p. 8vo. (Bohn's Autiq. Lib. iv.) A critic in The Archwological Mine, 1852, asserts that the edition of Richard of Circneester in this volume is, in fact, a reprint of Hatcher's edition of 1809, but without the notes which illustrate it, and without the concordance between Richard and Antoninus which Hatcher gives. See Mr. Wex's Dissertation on Richard of Circucester, in Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1846, 365; A

Renewed Examination of Richard of Circucestor, abid., March, 1853, 270-273, (by Arthur Huesay;) Richard of Circucester, ibid., April, 1853, 392, (by G. M.;) Richard of Circucester, ibid., July, 1853, 48-48, (by Arthur Hussey.) G. M. (supra) informs us that Sir Richard Colt Hoare, an eminent authority, assured him that he had no doubt of the Itmerary of Richard of Cironcester being an original work, and added that he had tested it in a remarkable member."

Bertram says that the MS. "came into his hands in a very extraordinary manner with many other curiosities:" it was hoped that it would be found in an ordinary manner, by an examination of the archives of the Royal Library at Copenhagen; but it has never been discovered Gibbon savs.

"Though it may not seem probable be [Richard] wrote from the MSS, of a Roman general, he shows a genuine knowledge of antiquity, very extraordinary for a monk of the fourteenth century."—Decline and Full, chap. xxi., n. See, also, chap.

The result of the investigations of Mr. Hussey (ubi supra) is, he tells us, an entire incredulity respecting the authenticity of the "so-called Richard of Circucoster's work." (Gent. Mag., March, 1853, 273.)

Mr. Richardson now undertook a teak of no little

Mr. Richardeon now undertook a task of no little magnitude in inception, and of much more formidable dimensions as perfected in design and completed in exccution: a Dictionary of the English Language for the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, (for which he was to iurnish other lexicographical articles also.) Part 1 of the Encyclopædia was pub, in 1818, and three other parts followed; after which the failure of the publishers caused a suspension of the work until it was taken in hand by Mr. Mawman. In 1835 Mr. Pickering commenced the publication (to be completed in thirty quarto parts) of the (2) New Dictionary of the English Language, as a separate work. The last part was issued in 1837; and the work was reissued in a complete shape, with new title-pages, in 1837, and also in 1838 and in 1839: each time in 2 vols. 4to, £5 5s.

The numbers were reprinted in New York as fast as they appeared in England; and in January, 1837, the American publisher remarks, in an address to the public,

"A large edition of the first numbers was quickly subsauted;"
a second was produced; and before the ninth number became current, a third edition became necessary, which has subsequently been put through the press, and is again name; such 1791

We present in chronological sequence Sir John's con-tributions to the natural history of later voyages: 5. Tho Mammalia to the Zoology of Captain Becchey's Voyages to the Pacific and Behring's Straits, in H.M.S. Blossom, 1839, 4to. The other contributors were N. A. Vigors, J. T. Lay, E. T. Bennett, Richard Owen, John Edward Gray, W. Sowerby, and Rev. Wm. Buckland. See Beecher, Sir Frederick William. 6. The Fishes to the Zoology of the Vayage of H.M.S. Erdens and BERCHEY, SIR FREDERICK WILLIAM. 6. The Fishes to the Zoology of the Voyage of H.M.S. Erebus and Terror, under the Command of Sir James Clark Ross, during the Years 1839, '40, '41, '42, '43, 18 Pts., r. 4to, 1841-48. The following gentlemen were engaged to prepare the zoology of this voyage: John Edward Gray, Beasts, Reptiles, Shells, Sea-Eggs, and Corals; George Paleat Gray Vishes Sir I Bisharden Fisher Morris Robert Gray, Birds; Sir J. Richardson, Fishes; Messrs. Bell and Goodsir, Crustaceaus; Messrs. A. White and E. Doubleday, Insects. Botany : see HOOKER. JOSEPH DAL-TON. Richardson, John. Works on Brewing, 1777-88:
the Natural History to The Last of the Arctic Voyages, being a Narrative of the Expedition of H.M.S. Assistance, under the Command of Captain Sir Edward Belcher, C.B., in Search of Sir John Franklin, during the Years 1852-53-54, 2 vols. r. 8vo, 1855. The other contributors to the Appendix are Richard Owen, Lovell Raeve, Thomas Bell, and J. W. Salter. Sir E. Belcher's Narrative has not escaped censure, (see Athen., 1855, 1397;) but the work as a whole has been commended by Athenœum, Spectator, M. Post, Atlas, Press, and Weekly Despatch. The "universal typographical magnificence," noticed by the Edinburgh Review, makes the volumes an ornament to the library of the mere collector, as well as a text-book for the naturalist.

To retrace our steps: whilst residing at the Royal Naval Hospital at Haslar, Sir John took a lively interest in the museum established there by the intelligent zeal of Sir Wm. Burnett, Inspector General, and in 1842 he issued the first part of (10) Icones Piscium; or, Plates of Rare Fishes, imp. 4to: also 1846. Unfortunately, as this was the first, so also it was the last, part published. About eighteen years later Sir John's name appeared in connection with (11) Second Supplement to the First Edition of the History of British Fishes by the late William Yarrell: Being also a First Supplement to the Second Edition: illustrated by Wood-cuts; Edited by Sir John Richardson, C.B., 1860. See Athen., 1860, i. 377; YARRELL, WILLIAM, No. 2. To the Encyclopædia Britannica, 8th ed., he contributed the articles Franklin. Sir John, (see Rogers, Henry,) Ichthyology, and Polar Regions, enlarged and published separately, 1861, demy 8vo: see Lon. Athen., 1861, i. 428. Died. June 5, 1865: see Lon. Reader, 1865, i. 707, (Obitnary.) The "last, and perhaps not least happy, ten years of his life" were "spent by the shores of pleasant Grasmere." McIlraith, 1868, fp. 8vo.

Richardson, Jonathan, 1665?—1745, left the office of a serivener, to whom he had been apprenticed, for the studio of John Riley, the portrait-painter, where, by de-votion to his master's art and his nicee, he gained reputation and a wife. After the death of Kneller and Dahl he stood at the head of English portrait-painters; but it is as an art critic rather than as un artist, by his precept rather than his practice, that he is entitled to consideration. It is a curious fact that he was both the father-in-law of Hudson, his successor in the supremacy, and the father-in-art of Hudson's pupil, Sir Joshua Reynolds, whose fondness for painting was first excited by the perusal of Richardson's Essay on the Theory of Paintang, (see Johnson's Life of Cowley.) As an author, his name is known in connection with—1. Essay on the Theory of Painting, Lon., 1715, '25, '33, 8vo. See No. 8, Incory of Painting, Lon., 1715, '25, '35, 8vo. See Ro. 8, "Neither is it to be supposed that Sir Joshua Reynolds would not have been a painter, and every whit as great a one, had he never seen 'Richardson's Treathe.' He read the treatise with interest, because his mind was naturally turned more towards painting than to any thing else. . . . But, to return to Reynolds and Richardson, it must be admitted that if over books could infine a love of set, and an emulation to shine as a painter, into a mind hitherto insensible to such things, Richardson's discourses would be the most likely to do so,"—C. Richardson, Samuel, 1689-1761, a native of Derbyshipe, the son of a joiner, at a very early age gave evidence of those powers of composition by the exercise of which be gained, in later life, the title of "The inventor of the English novel." After delighting his companions at the village grammar-school (the only "university" which he ever entered) with extemporaneous romances, he would turn his attention to another circle of admirers, he would turn his attention to another circle of admirers, which we shall let him describe in his own words:

"As a bashful and not forward boy." I was an early favourite with all the young women of taste and reading in the neighbourhood. Half a dozen of them, when met to work with their needles, used, when they got a book they liked, and thought I should, to borrow me to read to them; their mothers sometimes with them; and both mothers and daughters used to be pleased with the observations they put me upon making.

"I was not more than thirteen, when three of these young women, having an high opinion of my taciturnity, revealed to me their love-secrets, in order to induce me to give them copies to write after, or correct, for answers to their lovers' letters; nor did any of them ever know that I was the secretary of the others. I have been directed to chief, and even repulse, when an offence was either taken or given, at the very time that the heart of the chider or repulser was open before me, overflowing with estoem and affection, and the fair repulser, discaling to be taken at her word, directing this word or that expression to be softened or changed. One, highly gratified with her lover's fervour and vows of everlasting love, has said, when I have asked her direction.—'I cannot tell you what to write; but"—her heart on her lips—'you cannot write too kindly.' All her fear was only lest she should incur slight for her kindness."—Richardows Life and Coresp., i., Introd., xyxix_xl.

"Human nature"—thus comments Richardson's biographer on the lines just quoted—'is human nature in every class: the hopes and the lears, the perplexities and the struggles, of these low-bred girls in probably an obscure village, supplied the future aution with those ideas which, by their gradual development, produced the character of a Clarissa and a Clementina; nor was he probably happier or amused in a more lively manner, when sitting in his grotts, with a circle of the best-informed women in England about him, who in after-times counted his society, than in reading to these girls in, it may be, a little back-shop, or a mantoannaker's parlour with a brick floor."—Mrs. Barbar Luculó supro.

Yet neither love of books nor of female admiration un-

You neither love of books nor of female admiration unfitted Young Richardson for untiring application to the interests of his master, John Wilde, a London printer, to whom, at the age of seventeen, he was bound apprentice. Released from his servile though honourable labours in 1713, he toiled six more years as a journeyman and corrector of the press, and at last, in 1719, ventured to set up a printing-office in Fleet Street. Like the famous printer of a later generation, our countryman, Benjamia Franklin, fond of supplying as well as managing the press, he occupied the hours which could be spared from the supervision of his workmen in writing prefaces, and what he calls "houest dedications," for other men's books, and in compiling indexes for the booksellers. His thrift gained customers, and a wife,—the daughter of his old master; his manners made friends, and his integrity and piety secured respect.

His reputation, if not his purse, was extended as the printer of The Daily Journal, and The Daily Gazetteer; the Duke of Wharton engaged him in the same capacity in connection with The Briton, of which Richardson issued six numbers; and by the favour of Mr. Speaker Onslow he printed the first edition-20 volumes-of the Journal of the House of Commons. The last-named friend would fain have given him a place in court; but the printer was wiser than his great friend, and stuck to his type,-from which, indeed, neither increased wealth, literary fame, nor rural attractions could ever entirely divorce him. In 1754 he was chosen Master of the Stationers' Company; and in 1760, only about a year before his doath, he purchased a moiety of the patent of law-printer, and carried on that department of business with Miss Catherine Lintot. Yet towards the close of life he was found less frequently at his printing-office than at his country-seat at Parson's Green, where he relieved the ennul of an invalid by the triumphs of an author,-delighting himself, and alternately charming and wearying the fair auditors who encircled his chair, by his own compositions sonorously chanted by his own voice. This, indeed, had long been his custom:

indeed, had long been his custom:

"White Clarissa and Sir Charles Grandison were in progress, Richardson used to read a part of his labours to some of this chosen circle every morning, and receive, it may readily be supposed, a liberal tribute of praise, with a very moderate portion of criticism. Miss Highmore, who inherited a paternal taste for painting, has recorded one of these scenes in a small drawing, where Richardson, in a morning cap and gown, is introduced reading the manuscript of Sir Charles Grandison to such a little group.

Mrs. Charlotte Lennox was a regular visit or at Parson's Green, and scarce could remember a visit in which her hoet had not rehearsed at least one, but probably two or three, voluminous lotters, if he found her in the humour of listening."

his second wife, Miss Leake, he had five daughters and a son, and of these, four daughters and their mother outlived him. One of these daughters was the mother of lived him. One of these daughters was the mother of the late Rev. Samuel Crowther, the author of the remark recorded by Bishop Wilson, late of Calcutts, in a note to Crowther's Funeral Sermon, and commented on by Lord Macaulay in his Speech on Talfourd's Bill on Copyright, —"I am an unworthy grandson, nover to have read these celebrated works." The lexicographer's admiration of Richardson's works is well known: we shall have something on the subject to quote hereafter. In the mean time, the following ancedote will bear repetition:

"John Gilbert Cooper related that soon after the publication of his Dictionary, Garrick, being asked by Johnson what people said of it, told him that, among other anumatorsions, it was objected that he cited authorities which were boneath the dignity of such a work, and mentioned Richardson. 'Nay,'said Johnson, 'I have done worse than that: I have cited thee, David.'"—Boswell: ut supra, 656.

II. PANELA; OR, VIRTUE REWARDED.
Of the earliest compositions of our author we have had the narration in the writer's own words: he shall let us into the secret history of the more ambitious efforts of his maturer years:

"My business, till within these few years, filled all my time.

I had no leisure; nor, being unable to write by a regular plan, knew that I he to much invention till I simost accidentally slid.

into the writing of Pamela. And, besides, little did I imagine that any thing I could write would be so kindly received by the world,"

And what bappy "accident" was it that transformed

And what bappy "accident" was it that transformed the comparatively obscure printer into a popular author? 'Two booksellers, my particular friends, [Mr. Rivington and Mr. Osborno,] entreated me to write for them a little volume of Letters in a common style, on such subjects as night be of use to those country readers who were unable to induce for themselves. 'Would it be any harm,' said I,' in a piece you want to be written so low, if we should instruct them how they should think and act in common cases as well as midite? They were the more urgent for me to begin the little volume for this hint. I set about it; and, in the progress of it, writing two or three letters [eide No. 8, sapria] to instruct handsome girls who were obliged to go out to service, as we phrase it, how to avoid the snares that night be laid against their virtue, the above story recurred to my thought; and hence sprung Pamela."—Richardson's Corresp., Introd., 1.

In a letter to another correspondent, Richardson gives

In a letter to another correspondent, Richardson gives a fuller account of the history of this novel, prefaced by the facts upon which he erected his superstructure.

As we have already had occasion to notice, the success of Pamela—said to have been written in less than three months—was unbounded. It was recommended from the pulpit, praised in the coffee-rooms, culogized at the clubs, and quoted in the parlour. Pope asserted that it would do more good than twenty sermons; an oracular critic of the day declared that, "if all other books were to be burnt, Pamela and the Bible should be preserved;" and even at fashionable Ranclagh "it was usual for the ladies to hold up the volumes to one another, to shew that they had got the book that every one was talking of."

This astonishing success induced some unprincipled fellow-we have such in this generation-to publish a continuation of the story, under the title of Pamela in High Life. Richardson was so unwise as to injure his reputation by publishing himself two more volumes of

"These volumes," remarks Mrs. Barbauld, "are, like most second parts, groatly interior to the first. They are superfluous, for the plan was all easly completed; and they are dult, for, instead of incident and passion, they are filled with heavy sentiment, in diction far from elegant. A great part of it aims to palliate, by counter-criticism, the faults which had been found in the first parts. It is less a continuation than the author's defence of hunself."—Eye of Redardson.

The name of the author of Pamela in High Life is unteresting the second of the content of the second of the se known; but Pamela stirred the genius of another writer, who soon gained, has ever since held, and is likely ever to maintain, a loftier niche in the Temple of Fame than the idol of the town, whose "sentimentalism" was ridisaled in the pages of Joseph Andrews: see Figling, Hexur, p. 592, supra. But, on the other hand, it must not be forgotten that the famous dramatist founded on the story of Pamela two of his plays, Pamela Nubile and Pamela Maritata.

Pamela Maritata.

"Pamela ... made a most powerful sensation on the public. Hithorto romances had been written, generally speaking, in the old French taste, containing the protracted amours of princes and princesses, told in language coldly extravagant and metaphysically abound. In these wearsome performances there appeared not the most distant allusion to the ordinary tone of feeding, the slightest attempt to paint mankind as it exists in the ordinary walks of life; all was tant and hombest, still and buskin. It will be Richardson's eternal praise, did he merit no more, that he tore from his personages those painted vizards, which concealed, under a clumay and affected disguisse, every thing like the natural lineauents of the human countenance, and placed them before us barefaced, in all the actual changes of feature and complexion, and all the light and shade of human passion. It requires a teader to be in some degree acquainted with the large folice of inantly over which our ancestors yawned themselves to sleep, ere he can estimate the delight they must have experienced from this unexpected return to truth and nature.

they must have experienced from this unexpected return to truth and nature.

"The simplicity of Richardson's tale aided the effect of surprise. . . . The judicious criticism of Mrs. Barbauld [Introduct. to Richardson's Correspondence] has pounted out that the character of Pamela is far from obtaining a heroic cast of excellence. On the contrary, there is a strain of cold-blooded prudence which runs through all the latter part of the novel, to which we are obliged almost to deny the name of virtue. . . . It is, perhapa, invidicus to enter tax closely upon the general temlency of a work of entertainment. But when the admirrers of Pamela challenge for that work the merit of doing more good than twenty sermons, we demur to the motion."—Six Warter Scott: Life of Etchardson.

with the animal versions of lars. Barbania and the author of Waverley:

"Mrs. Barbanid's objection to the moral of 'Pamela' appears to me over-refined an' under-reasoned. His object is to dispose young women of low rank to good conduct, by such motives as will work. The hope of marrying a squire, though rather profligate, is a powerful inducement. This is a low and homely morality, to be sire; but R. in this place simed no higher."—

Malitt's admiration of rameis and the genus of the author was warmly proclaimed:
"Taking the general idea of the character of a modest and beautiful country girl, and of the ordinary situation in which she is placed, he makes out all the rest, even to the annalised circumstance, by the mere force of a reasoning imagination. It would seem as if a step lost would be as fatal here as in a mathematical demonstration. The development of the character is the count simple, and comes the nearest to mature that it can do matical demonstration. The development of the character is the most simple, and comes the nearest to nature that it can do, without being the same thing. The interest of the story increases with the dawn of understanding and reflection in the herome: her sentiments gradually expand themselves, like opening flowers."—Lects. on the English Comic Writers; Lect. "I recollect an anecdote told me by a late highly respected inhabitant of Windsor, as a fact which he could personally teatify to, having occurred in a village [Slough, Bucks] where he resuled several years, and where he actually was at the time it took place. The blacksmith of the village had got hold of Richarco son's novel of Paneln, or Virtue Rewarded, and used to read it aloud in the long summer evenings, seated on his anvil, and never failed to have a large and attentive audience. It is a preity long-winded book; but their patience was fully a match for the author's prolixity, and they furly listened to it all. At length, when the happy turn of fortune arrived which brings the hero and heroine together, and describes them as living long and happily, according to the most approved rules, the congregation were so delighted as to raise a great shout, and, procuring the church keys, actually set the parish bells actinging."—SIR JOHY F. III. CLARISSA HABLOWE; or, The History of a Young Laby.

LADY.

"The work on which his fame as a classic of England will rest forevor. The talo, the that of its predecessor, is very simple; but the scene is laid in a higher rank of life, the characters are drawn with a bolder pencil, and the whole accompaniments are of a far lotter mood. . . . The publication of Clarisas raised the tame of the author to the height. No work had appeared belorg, pachaps none has appeared since, containing so many direct appears no many direct appears to the containing so the containing so the containing so the containing so m of a far latter mood. . . . The publication of Clarisas raised the name of the author to the height. No work had appeared before, perhaps none has appeared since, containing so many direct appeals to the pessions, stated, too, in a manner so irresistible. And high as his reputation stood in his own country, it was even more exalted in those of France and Germany, whose imaginations are more exalty exerted, and their pessions more casily moved by tales of fletitions distress, than are the cold-blooded English. Foreigners of distinction have been known to visit liampetend and to inquire for the Flask-walk, distinguished as a scene in Clarisas's history, just as travellers visit the vocks of Modlerie to view the localities of Rousseau's tale of passion. District view with Rousseau in heaping increase upon the shrine of the English author. The former compares limit of Homer, and peche is to his memory the same honours which are rendered to the Father of epic poetry; and the last, besides his well-known but st of cloquent panegyrie, records his opinion in a letter to D'Alembert: 'On n'a jamais hat encore, en quelque langue que ce soit, de roman égal à Clarisse, in mêns approchant.'"—Sta Watter Scott: Life of Richardson.

"Those deplorably tedious lamentations, 'Clarissa' and 'Sir Charles Grandison,' which are pictures of high life as conceived by a bookseller, and romances as they would be spiritualized by a Methodist tencher,' . . . Many English books, I conclude, are to be bought at Paris. I am sure Richardson's works are, for they have stupided the whole French nation. I will not answer for our best authors."—Horace Wattenta, 1765: Letters, ed. 1801, iv. 205, 2308, Soc, also, 2309, 308, 420, 449; v. 06; and villi. 159.

"The plot, as we have seen, is simple, and no underplots interfere with the main desgin—no digression, no episodes. It is wonderful that, without these helps of common writes, he could support a work of such length. With Clarissa it begin—with the namin desgin—no digression, no episodes. It is won with the conscious trimmphs of virtue."—Mrs. Barbauld: Life of Richardson.

"Mrs. Rarbauld's account of the moral of 'Clarissa' is one of the noblest pieces of initigated and rational Stoicism in the world, 6... I have been reading 'Clarissa Harlowe,' and my frame is so easily disturbed that a few of the most con mon sentences in the first hundred pages of the first volume have brought tears from me. . . I have just finished poor 'Chrissa,' and my body is too weak for writing a criticism, even if my mind had power for it. She left her father's house on the 10th of April, and dued on the 7th of September. . . The effect of the death of Clarissa—or of Mary Stuart—on the heart, by no means depends on the fact that the one really died, but on the vivacity of the exhibition by the two great painters, Hume and Richardson."—Sta James Mackintosh: Life, i. chap. v.; ii. chaps. ii., iii. н., ін.

ii., iii.

"Mrs. Rarbauld's criticism, we think, is equally judicious and rofined."—Lord Jerran: Edin. Rev., v. 30.

"Clarissa is, however, his master-piece, if we except Lovelece. If she is fine in herself, she is still finer in his account of her.

. . . . I should suppose that never sympathy more deep or sincere was excited than by the heroine of Richardson's romance, except by the calemities of real life. The links in this wonderful chain of interest are not more finely wrought than their whole weight is overwhelming and irrestable. Who can forget the exquisite gradations of her long dying-scene, or the closing of the coffin-lid when Miss Howe comes to take her last leave of the coffin-lid when Miss Howe comes to take her last leave of the rifered, or the heart-breaking reflection that Clarissa nukes on what was to have been her wedding-day?"—HALLITT: Loci. on the English Novelists.

"Perhaps the most pathetic tale ever published."—Dr. Drake: Essays.

But let us not forget Dr. Johnson's tribute:

But let us not forget Dr. Johnson's tribute:

"The first time I was in company with Dr. Johnson, which was at Miss Cotterel's. I well remember the finitering notice he took of a lady present, on her saying that she was inclined to estimate the mornity of every person according as they liked or disliked 'Clarissa' Harlowe.' He was a great admirrer of Richardson's works in general, but of 'Clarissa' he always spoke with the tighest enthusiastic praise. He used to say that it was the first book in the world for the knowledge it displays of the human heart."—Miss Reynold's Recollections: Croker's Bosnell's Johnson, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 830.

It will be seen (Ayscoven, Sant., p. 85, supre) that we have already given an extract from a letter of Johnson's to Richardson respecting a new edition of Chrissa, (see, also, Johnson's Preface to the Life of Rowe, or ROWE, NICHOLAS, No. 3, infra:) and it would appear by the following lines in a later letter (26th Sept. 1753) that No. 6 in the preceding List of Richardson's Publica-TIONS I as suggested by the lexicographer:

"Cannot I prevail, this time, for an Index? such as I wished, and shall wish to Clarissa? Suppose that in one volume an accurate index was made to the three works—but while I am writing an objection arises—such an index to the three would look like the preclusion of a fourth, to which I will never contribute; for if I cannot benefit mankind, I hope never to injure them."—Boswell: ut supra.

Each volume of Sir Charles Grandison is prefaced by an index, and a list of similes and allusions is appended. Malone informs us that the Preface to this volume (No. 6, supra) and the Preface to the first two vols. of Clarissa were written by the Rev. William (afterwards Bishop) Warburton.

"This novel may display more talent than Sir Charles Grandison, (though, when I recollect the character of Clementina, I should be disposed to contest even this point,) but it has certainly interested and delighted mo less. "I'll the grand catastrophe we are exasperated to maddening impatignce by the incessant and varied persecutions of the helpless heroine."— Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit.: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1834, 1.138. See, also, 1840, i. 313, n.

Lord Byron was not only not "interested" in Clarisse but declared his inability to read it through. On the other hand, the Rev. Martin Sherlock, in his volume of Letters on Several Subjects, published in 1781, declares that Clarissa has not an equal in the universe for wit, sentiment, and sense.

"I [Thackeray] spoke to him [Lord Macaulay] once about Clarissa. 'Not read Clarissa.' he cired out. 'Il you have once thoroughly entered on Clarissa, and are infected by it, you can't leave it. When I was in India, I passed one hot season at the hills, and there were the governor-general, and the secretary of government, and the commander-in-chief, and their wives. I had Clarissa with me; and, as soon as they began to read, the whole station was in a passion of excitement about Miss Harlowe and her nisfortunes and her scandrelly Lovelnee. The governor's wife seized the book, and the secretary waited for it, and the chief-justice could not read it for tears!' He acted the whole seems; he paced up and down the Athenaum library; I dareasy he could have spoken pages of the book,—of that book, and of what countless plies of others!"—W. M. THACKERAY: Nil Nist Bomum: Curniall Mag., No. 1, Jan. 1860.

"Mr. Serjeant Hill disputing once with a young pupil who contended for the accuracy of Richardson's descriptions of live in 'Clarissa Harlowe,' the learned Serjeant alleged that Richardson was any thing but an accurate man; and, in proof of his sasertion, asked the young student if he had read Clarissa's Will; and added, 'You will find there is not one of the uses or trusts in it that can be supported.' "—Tremaine, by Ward. See, also, Letters of the Earl of Dudley to the Bishop of Clariasa 1840, 8vo.

IV. THE HISTORY OF SIR CHARLES GRANDISON.

Johnson's exceptions to the Preface (see Boswell, ubi supra, 83) are well taken. As regards the work itself, perhaps enough, though not all that was designed, was given to the world.

given to the world.

"Richardson has sent me his 'History of Sir Charles Grandison,' in four volumes octavo, which amuses me. It is too long, and there is too much mere talk in it. Whenever he goes uthra creptdam, into high life, he grossly mistakes the modes; but, to do him justice, he never mistakes nature, and he has surely great knowledge and skill both in painting and in interesting the heart."—Lord Chesterfuld to David Ballett, Nov. 5, 1788. "The effect of treading this work is like an increase of kindred, You find yourself all of a sudden introduced into the midst of a large family, with aunts and cousins to the third and fourth generation, and grandmothers both by the father's and nother's side; and a very odd set of people they are,—but people whose real existence and personal identity you can no more disputs than your own senses; for you see and hear all that they do or say. What is still more extraordinary, all this extreme claborateness in working out the story seems to have cost the author nothing; for it is said that the published works are mere abridgements. I have heard (though this I suspect must be a pleasant exaggration) that Sir Charles Grandson was originally written in eight-and-twenty volumes. ... "Moreor remained inseemble to the passion of Lady Chementina, except Sir Charles Grandson himself, who was the object of P?"—Harritz: Lect. os the English Novelists.

"Sir Charles encounters no misfortunes, and can hardly be said to undergo any trials. The author, in a word, has sent himself.

Happy and glorious.

Itappy and glorious.

. . . In the living world, a state of trial and a valley of tears, such unspotted worth, such unvarying patiention, is not to be met with; and, what is still more important, it could not, if we suppose it to have existence, be attended by all those favours of fortune which are accumulated upon Richardson's here; and hence the fatal objection of Sir Charles Grandison being the 'Faultless monster that the world ne'er saw.'

hence the lates objection of Sir Charles Graminson being the

'Faultiess monster that the world ne'er saw.'

... To take the matter less gravely, and consider Sir Charles Gramison as a work of amissement, it must be allowed that the interest is destroyed in a great measure by the unceasing ascendency given to the fortune as well as the character of the hero.
We feel he is too much under the special protection ofths author to need any sympathy of ours, and that he has nothing to dread from all the Policzfens, C'Haras, and so forth, in the world, so long as Richardson is decidedly his friend. Neither are our feelings much interested about him even while his fate is undetermined. He evinces too little passion, and certainly no prefetence, being charly ready with heart and good-will to marry either Clementina or Harriet Byron, as circumstances may render most proper, and to bow gracefully upon the hand of the rejected lady and bid her alien. . . The teal heroine of the work, and the only one in whose fortunes we take a deep and decided interest, is the unhappy Clementinu, whose madness, and indeed her whole conduct, is sketched with the same exquisite pencil which drew the distresses of Clarisas."—Bir Watter Scott; Life of Richardson.

"Of all representations of madness, that of Clementina, inthe 'History of Sir Charles Grandison,' is the most deeply interesting. I know not whether even the madness of Lear is vrought up and expressed by so many little strictures of nature and genuine passion. Shall I say it is pedantry to profer and compare the madness of Orestes in Eurlpidos to this of Clementina?"—Dir Watters.

"This, though not indeed so pathetic as his former work, discovers more knowledge of life and manners, and is perfectly from that indelicacy and high colouring which occasionally render the scenery of Clarissa dangerous to young minds,"—PR. DRAKE: FEMDS, V. 53.

"Of fiction," he says, " read Sir Charles Grandison," &c.-kin's Elements of Drawing, 1857.

As an American, it does not become us to forget that the style of a great master of reasoning of our own country, a mental philosopher perhaps not second to any cry, a mental philosopher perhaps not second to any of modern times, —pronounced, indeed, by Robert Hall: "the greatest of the sons of men," and by Sir James Mackintosh declared to be "perhaps unmatched, certainly unsurpassed, among men for power of subtile argument,"—was improved by a diligent study of the "beautiful flowing language" in which the tranquit satisfactions of Sir Charles and the tragic sorrows of Claracting are presented to the reader. VI. A GENERAL ESTIMATE OF RICHARDSON'S MERITS AND DEMERITS.

VI. A GENERAL ESTIMATE OF RICHARDSON'S MERITS AND DEMERITS.

"Richardson, with the mere advantages of nature, improved by a very moderate progress in education, struck out at once, and of his own accord, into a new province of writing, in which he succeeded to admiration; and, what is more remarkable, he not only began, but finished, the plan on which he set out, leaving no room for any one after him to render it more complete; and not one of the various writers that have ever stree attempted to initiate him has in any respect equalled or at all approached near him. This kind of romance is peculiarly his own; and I consider him as a truly great natural genius; as great and super-eminent in his way as Shakspear and Milton were in theirs."—Dr. Young, author of the Night Thoughts.

"Oh, Richardson! then singular genus to my eyes! thou shalt form my reading he all times. If, forced by sharp necessity, my friend falls into indigence; if the mediocrity of my fortune is not sufficient to bestow on my children the necessary cares for their education, I will sell my books,—but then shalt remain! yos, then shalt rest in the same class with Moses, Homer, Euripides, and Sophoeles, to be read alternately.

"Oh, Richardson! I date pronounce that the most verifable history is full of fictions and thy romances are full of truths. History paints some individuals; then paintest the human spacies... Painter of nature, then never hest.... Thou has that me folice."—Depense: Ecops on Richardson. Fule Disraeli's Carlosities of Lit., ed. 1851, 194.

"How applicable to Scot's works is the observation made by Madame du Definad on Richardson's Novels, in one of her letters to Voltaire: La merale y set to action, et n'a lamais été traitée d'une manière plus intéressante. On meurit d'envie d'être parfait après cette lecture, et l'on croft que rien n'ast si aisé."—Land Brison: Londy Blussusgion's Omerastions with Lord Byron.

"To Richardson, who erred by trying to inditate Corvantes in slovating to poetry the realities of modern lite, we ca

"If Richardson's style is not good,—and of this we foreigners are no judges,—he will not live, for it is only by style a writer lives. . . . But if Richardson has been forsaken only for vulgar expressions, unendurable by elegant society, he may revive; the revolution which is taking place, by lowering the aristocracy and raising the middling classes, will render less perceptible, or remove altogether, the traces of lowly habits and of an interior language."—YUSOUNT DE CHATEAUBRIAND: Netches of Eng. Lit., English trans., ii. 29d, 1837.

"Richardson has perhaps lost, though unjustly, a part of his popularity at home; but he still contributes to support the fame of his country abroad. The small blemishes of his diction are lost in translation. The changes of English manners, and the occasional homelines of some of his representations, are unfelt by foreigners. Fielding will ever remain, "&c.—Sir James Mackityces: Ethes. Res., xxv. 485; and in his Miscell. Works, ed. 1854, it. 487.

"The novels of Richardson are at once among the grandest and the most singular creations of human genius. They combine an accurate acquaintance with the freest liberthism, and the sternest professions of virtue,—a sporting with vicuous casustry, and the deepest horror of free-thinking,—the most stately ideas of paternal authority, and the most elaborate display of its abuses. . . . After all, the general impression made on us by his works is virtuous."—Sir T. Noon Talpound: New Month. Maq.: reput, in his Miscell. Writings.

"The most moral of all our novel-writers is Richardson, a writer of avegliest intentions and of very considerable canadity.

Richardson's nature is always the nature of sentiment and

DR. HEOR BLAIR: Lect. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Loct. XXXVII.

"Richardson's nature is always the nature of sentiment and reflection, not of impulse or situation. He furnishes his characters, on every occasion, with the presence of mind of the author. He makes them act, not as they would from the impulse of the moment, but as they might upon reflection and upon a careful review of every motive and circumstance in their situation. They regularly sit down to write letters; and if the biasiness of life consisted in letter-writing, and was carried on by the post, (like a Spanish game at class,) human nature would be what Richardson represents it. All actual objects and feelings are blunted and dealened by being represented through a medium which may be true to reason, but is take in nature. He confounds his own point of view with that of the immediate actors in the scene; and hence presents you with a conventional and factitions nature, instead of that which is real. . Richardson's wit was unlike that of any other writer,—his humour was so too. Both were the effect of intense a tivity of mind,—laboured, and yet completely effectual."—Hazitt: Lect. on the English Novelists.

"Richardson was well qualified to be the discoverer of a new style of writing, for he was a cautions, deep, and minute examiner of the human heart, and, like Cook or Parry, left neither head, bay, nor inlet behind him until he had traced its soundings, and lad it down in his chart, with all its minute sinuosities, its depths, and its shadows. . . Tho style of Richardson was of that pliable and fiello kind which could, with slight variety, be adapted to what best befitted his various personness. When he wrote in kin highest characters, it was copious, expressive, and appropriate; but, through the imperfection of his education, not always strictly elegant, nor even accurate. . . The power has been, and probably never will be, excelled. Those of distressed innocence, as in the history of Charassa and Clementian, rend the very heart; an if ew, was accurate knowledge of humanity manifested in his higher efforts. His comedy is not overstrained; he never steps beyond the bounds of nature, and never secrifices trait and probability to brilliancy and offect."—Six Walter Scott: Life of Richardson

See, also, Sir Walter's Contrast between Richardson and Mackenzie and Sterne, in his Life of Henry Mackenzie. "Richardson too often paints the impossible in character, but he is unrivalled in the chiberateness of representation."—Sir D. K. Samprone. Richardson's and Progress of Lit.

"The great excellence of Richardson's novels consists, we think, in the unparalleled minuteness and copiousness of his descriptions, and in the pains he takes to make us thoroughly acquainted with overy particular in the character and situation of the personages with whom we are occupied. . . In this art Richardson is undoubtedly without an equal, and, if we except be Foe, without a competitor, we believe, in the whole history of literature. . . This we certainly think the chief merit of Richardson's productions; for, great as his knowledge of the human heart and his powers of pathetic description must be admitted to be, we are of opinion that he might have been equalled in those particulars by many whose productions are admitted to be, we are of opinion that he might have been equalled in those particulars by many whose productions are infinitely less interesting.

"That his pieces were all intended to be strictly moral, is indisputable; but it is not quite so clear that they will uniformly be found to have this tendency.... Richardson's good people, in short, are too wise and formal ever to appear in the light of desirable companions, or to excite in a youthful mind any wish to rescribble them. The galety of all his characters, too, is extremely gitlish and silly, and is much more like the prattle of spoiled children than the wit and pleasantry of persons acquainted with the world. The diction throughout is heavy, vulgar, and embarrassed; though the interest of the tragical scenes is too powerful to allow us to attend to any inferior consideration."—Lord hyppersers: Edin. Rev., v. 43, 44; and in his Contrib. to Edin. Rev., ed. 1853, 151, 152; and repub., Swift and Richardson, 1852, cr. 8vo, (Longman's Tray, Lib.)

poetical critic, much more must be said of the former, if justice is to be awarded him:

"A kind and generous master, he was eager to encourage his servants to persevere in the same course of patient labour by which he had himselt attained fortune. . . . His hospitality was of the most liberal, as well as the most judelons, kind. One of his correspondents describes him as sitting at his door, like an old patriarch, and inviting all who passed by to enter and be refreshed;—'and thus,' says Mrs. Barlauld, 'whether they brought with them the means of anusing their host, or only required his kind notice and that of the family.' He was generous and benevolent to distressed authors, a class of men with whom his profession brought him into contact; and had occasion, more than once, to succour Br. Johnson during his days of poverty, and to assist his efforts to force himself into public notice. . . If we look yet closer into Richardson's private life, (and who loves not to know the slightest particulars concerning a man'of his genius!) we find so much to praise, and so very little description of one of the amiable characters he has drawn in his own works. A love of the human species; a desire to create happiness and to witness it; a life undisturbed by passion, and spent in doing good; pleasures which centred in elegant conversation, in bountiful hospitality, in the exchange of all the kindly intercourse of life,—marked the worth and unsophisticated simplicity of the good man's character."—Sir Walter Scott. Left of Richardson when he was a halo of virtue round his mightcap. All Europe had thrilled, panted, admired, trembled, wept, over the pages of the immortal little kind honest man with the round panuch. Harty came back quite glowing and proud at having a low from him. 'Ah,' says he,' my lord, I am glad to have seen him!'—Thackerat: The Fryphiness, i.c. k. xvi.

"His moral character was in the highest degree exemplary and amable. He was temperate, industrous, and with a kindness of heart, and a liberatity and generos must have made him a very general favourite, even if he had never acquired any literary distinction."—LORD JEFFREY: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 147.

But we have not left it to this late page of our work to do justice to Richardson's diffusive benevolence. See

GOLDSMITH, OLIVER, p. 689, col. 2, supra.

Surely a character so bright as this will hardly be obscured by the admission that the hospitable author preferred the society of men and women who liked him and his books to that of those who were indifferent to both, (is he the only author of whom this can be said?) and the acknowledgment that many of his private letters refer to particulars connected with the personages, the plots, and the denouements of his novels. Respecting the latter subject—in the proper understanding of which, the character of many authors is concerned—a few words of explanation will not be out of place. No inconsiderable penalty paid for successful authorship is the burden of a heavy correspondence,-originating with the kindness, the vanity, or the estentation of those who are disposed to encourage, congratulate, and patronize newly-acquired popularity, or are not unwilling to share in its honours and participate in its fruits. It is not enough to write; letters are desired in return; these are elicited by inquiries; and inquiries naturally and necessarily refor to that which is, or which is assumed to be, a matter of public concern. To these inquiries, a sense of courtesy, an emotion of gratitude, a regard to interest, or a satisfaction in acquaintanceship regarded as a tributo to real or supposed merit, insures responses,-more or less confidential, according to the disposition or taste of the one addressed. But, whether distantly polite or tediously autobiographical, letters thus elicited from an author can only refer to himself and to his works; and fra collection of such letters be published, they will very probably, but very unjustly, be censured by the thoughtless critic for obtrusive egotism. He who remembers the deluge of missives which overwhelmed Richardson on the publication of the first two volumes of Pappela and the first four volumes of Clarissa—not to refer to other postal embarrassments of the afflicted novelist-will not be surprised either at the bulk (less, indeed, than one volume of the four volumes which compose his Correspondence) or the character of the author's cpistolary compositions.

'His chemical poems are nothing more than the doctrines of alchemy clothed in plain language and a very ringged versification. . . These pieces have no other merit than that of serving to develop the history of chemistry in England. They cartainly contribute nothing to the state of our poetry. . . Ashmole says that Ripley, during his long stay at Rhodes, gave the knights of Malta £100,000 annually towards maintaining the war against the Turks, (Theat, Chemic, Brit., p. 458.) Ashmole could not have made this incredible assertion without supposing a circumstance equally incredible,—that Ripley was in actual possession of the philosopher's stone."—Warron: whi supra.

"Mr. Joseph Ritson, unilluminated by a particle of taste or fancy, and remarkable only for the unceasing drudgery with which he dedicated his life to one of the humblest departments of literary antiquities, and for the bitter insolence and foul abuse with which he communicated his dull sequisitions to the public, was equally [with Herbert in his ed. of Ames's Typ. But, poor unhappy spirit, thou art gone! Perhaps thy restless temper was disease: and mryst thou find peace in the grave!" [Note. Its died in August or September, 1803. Moore's Memoirs, vii. 1856, 13,) by Rev. Sydney Smith and Lord Brougham, will be found in The Edinburgh Review, April, 1803, 128-136. The reviewers, whatever may have been their intention, have failed te he compiliumnture, as will he seen by a brief evitent.

whatever may have been their intention, have failed to be complimentary, as will be seen by a brief extract:

"Hear how this puny, pitiful worm lifts its feeble cry to arraign the order of nature, and scoff at the Onniscience which, for wise purposes, though quite unknown to us, suffers it to crawl upon the earth.

Before taking leave of this most nauseous performance and of its wrotched author, we trust forever, a few words remain to be added upon the style in which all the strange absurdities and fitthy abonimations of his perserted brain are delivered. We do not mean to go farther than the external qualities,—the matchless ludicrousness of the orthogonal complete the control of the orthogonal complete the complete the control of the orthogonal complete the control of the orthogonal complete the complete the control of the orthogonal complete the control of the

The Quarterly Reviewer was charged with "killing his man," (see KEATS, JOHN,) and perhaps there were those who were disposed to charge the same crime on the Edinburgh critics; but, although Ritson survived this attack less than six months, we do not believe that his

Some collectors may be surprised at the number of works compiled by this industrious antiquary: they have probably been deceived by the incorrect and dishonest

These valuable attributes were unhappily combined with an eager tritiability of temper, which induced him to treat antiquarian trifles with the same seriousness which men of the world reserve for matters of importance, and disposed him to drive controversies into personal quarriels, by neglecting, in literary debate, the courtesies of ordinary society. Rittenhouse, David, LL.D., April 8, 1732-June 26, 1796, is generally styled a native of Germantown, but he was born on Paper Mill Run, Roxborough Township, near Germantown, and not far from the city of Philadelphia. After some years' experience in the country as a maker of clocks and mathematical instruments, in which he displayed wonderful ingenuity, in 1770 he removed to Philadelphia, where he pursued his business with great reputation, employing his leisure hours in attending the meetings and contributing to the Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, in the presidency of which, in 1791, he succeeded Benjamin Franklin. After employment, in 1779, 1784, 1786, 1787, and 1789, in the settlement of State boundsries, and acting as Treasurer of Penusylvania from 1777 to 1789, he was in 1792 appointed Director of the United States Mint, which post he retained until the year preceding his death. He published an Oration on Astronomy, delivered before the American Philosophical Society in 1775, (Phila., 1775, 4to,) and, as already noticed, many papers on astronomical, philosophical, and mathematical subjects in the first four vols, of the Transmathematical subjects in the first four vols. of the Transactions of that learned body. Robert of Cricklade, called by Leland and Wood Robertus Canutus, Prior of St. Frideswide, 1141, d. 1166, compiled an abridgment of the Natural History of Pliny the Elder, in nine books, (now in MS. in the British Museum, MS. Reg. 15, c. xiv.,) and some theological treatises. See Bale; Wood; Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, 186-187.

Robert of Gloucester, probably a monk of the abboy at Gloucester, and supposed by Selden to have lived in the reign of Edward I., was the author of a rhyming Chronicle (chiefly a metrical version of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Latin Chronicon) of English history from Brutns to about the year A.D. 1300. Of this Chronicle, which consists of more than ten thousand lines, there are MSS, in the Bodleian, the Cottonian, the Harleian, the Heralds' College, and other libraries. As already noticed, (see Hearne, Thomas, Nos. 20, 21,) it was pub. at Oxford in 1724 and 1810, and again in 1824, by Bagster, cach edit. in 2 vols. Svo: also Peter Langtoft's Chroniele, new.ed., 1825, 2 vols. Svo. Of the edits. of Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle of 1724 and 1810, copies were taken off on 1. p., 2 vols. r. 8vo, and on largest p., 2 vols. 4to. Some of the edit. of 1810 have red borders: the same is true respecting Peter Langtoft's Chronicle, edits. 1725 and 1810.

"Of all books I know none so valuable as the Chronicle of and 1810.

"Of all books I know none so valuable as the Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester for acquiring a knowledge of the old Saxon Tongne, which continued to be spoke till Chaucor undeftook to refine (as they term it) the language. . . . He, and not Chauter, as Dr. Fuller and some others would have it, is the genus of the English nation, and he is on that account to be as much respected as ever Ennius himself was among the Romans, and I have good reason to think that he will be so by friends to our antiquities and our old history."—Hearne.

"Old Robert of Gloucester, in the time of King Henry the Third, honoured his country with these his best English rhymes, which I doubt not but some (although most now are of the new out) will give the reading."—CAMPEN.

"This rhyming chronicle is totally destitute of art or imagination. The anthor has clothed the falless of Geoffrey of Monmonth in rhyme, which have often a more posted arr in Geoffrey's prose. The language is not much more easy or intelligible than that of many of the Norman-Saxon posms quoted in the preceding section: it is full of Saxonisms, which indeed abound, more or less, in every writer before Gower and Chaucer. But this obscurity is perhaps owing to the western dialect in which our monk of Gloucester was cliticated."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840, I. 47-53, (g. r.)

Roberts, David, b. 1796, at Stockbridge, Edinburgh, was apprenticed as a house-painter in his native place, but, coming to London in 1822, he found employment, in conjunction with his friend Stanfield, in painting scenes for Drury-Lane Theatre. Notices of his subsequent triumphs and of his great pictures will be found in Men of the Time, London, 1852-62, in Knight's English Cyclopædia, v., 1857, 114, and in the Lon. Athenæum, in its accounts of the Exhibitions at the Royal Academy. We have to do only with the books with which his name is connected; and of these the following are the principal: 1. Picturesque Views in Spain and Mo proofs, £00, 1835-38, 84 engravings, proofs, £6 6s.; India proofs, £10 10s. Originally pub. as illustrations to The Landscape Annual, vols. vi., vii., viii., ix., 1835-38, with Descriptive Letter-press by Thomas Roscoe: also, called The Tourist in Spain; each vol., p. 8vo. £1 1s.; l. p., £2 12s. 6d. These have been re-engraved in France many, and Spain. Part of them are known as Roberts's Picturesque Sketches in Spain; comprising 26 lithogra-Picturesque Sketches in Spain; comprising 26 lithographic engravings, mounted on card-board; 1837, £10 10s. 2. Views in the Holy Land, Egypt, Nubia, Arabia, &c., 20 Pts. imp. fol., es. 21s.; proofs, 31s. 6d.; col'd and mounted, 42s. 6d., 1843-46. See Lon. Athen., 1860, i. 624, No. 3. 3. Views in Ancient Egypt and Nubia, 21 Pts. imp. fol., es. 21s.; proofs, 31s. 6d.; col'd and mounted, 42s. 6d., 1846-48. In 1847, Nos. 2 and 3 (at Alfarman Moon's sale the coloured conjes were seld. on Alderman Moon's sale the coloured copies were sold, on an average, at £70 each) were issued as a consecutive series, consisting of 253 lithographic plates, (engraved by Louis Haghe,) atlas fol., in 20 cloth portfolios, (£48;) sometimes bound in 4 vols., sometimes in 6 vols., under the general title of Views in the Holy Land, Syris, Egypt, Nubla, Arabia, &c., with Historical Descriptions by Rev. Dr. Croly and W. Brookedon. A new edit., reduced from these lithographs to 12 in. by 84 in., (imp. 8vo.) was issued in fortnightly Parts, at £9 9s. for the whole, (bound together sometimes in 6 vols., sometimes in 3 vols.,) commencing with Doc. 1855, and completed in 1856. See Lon. Athen., 1862, ii. 807, n., 808, n. Mr. Roberts was one of the illustrators of Sir R. L. B. Lytton's Pilgrims of the Rhine, and of Lockbart's Ancient Spanish Ballads, (last ed., revised, 1858, 4to.)

Robertson, Frederick William, 1816-1853, a native of London, and a son of Capt. Frederick Robertson, of the Royal Artillery, studied for one year at the New Academy, Edinburgh, and subsequently attended the Philosophical Classes of that city, enjoying the pri-vate tuition of the Rev. Charles Henry Terrot, now Bishop of Edinburgh. He afterwards matriculated at Brazennose College, Oxford, and four days later received an appointment—not accepted—to the Second Regiment of Dragoon Guards. He graduated B.A. 1841, M.A. 1844; was for about twelve months Curate of St. Maurice and St. Mary Kalendar, Winchester; travelled for some time on the Continent; was married, at Geneva, to Ellen, third daughter of Sir George William Denys, Bart., of Easton Neston, co. Northampton, then equerry to H.R.H. the Duke of Sussex; acted for four years (1843-1847) as Curate to the Rev. Archibald Boyd, Incumbent of Christ Church, Cheltenham; officiated for two months in 1847 in place of the Rev. William Hanbury; Rector of St. Ebbs, Oxfordshire; August 15, 1817, because Incumbent of Tripity Callage Winter. beaute Incumbent of Trinity College, Brighton, and retained this position until his death, August 15, 1853. In 1852 he was chaplain to Philip Salamons. Esq., of Brighton, then High Sheriff of Sussex. He left, a son (Charles Boyd) and a daughter. He attracted large audiences both as a preacher and a lecturer, and his sermons published since his death have had a wide circulation.

Robertson, William, D.D., 1721-1793, a native of Borthwick, county of Mid-Lothian, Scotland, where his father, Rev. William Robertson, was minister, after a preparatory course at the school of Dalkeith, was placed, when only twelve years of age, at the University of Edinhurgh, where he greatly distinguished himself by the extent of his studies and the intensity of his application. In 1741 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Edinburgh to preach; in 1743 was appointed minister of Gladsmuir, and, upon an income of £100 per annum, supported himself and educated all of his brothers and sisters; in 1751 he married his cousin, Mary Nesbit, and soon afterwards became a member of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, where for thirty years he was the controlling spirit. In January, 1755, he gave to the world his only published sermon, The Situation of the World at the Time of Christ's Appearance, &c., —and in the same year contributed eight articles (six of which are historical) to the (old) Edinburgh Review, (see Works of Sir J. Mackintosh, ed. 1854, ii. 467-469;) in 1759, 2 vols. 4to, he published his History of Scotland, which achieved a great and immediate success; in the same year he was nominated Chaplain of Stirling Castle, in 1761 one of the King's Chaplains-in-Ordinary for Scotland, and in 1762 was elected Principal of the University of Edinburgh, the duties of which office he discharged of Edinburgh, the duties of which omes ne discharged with great reputation for thirty years; in 1764 he was made Historiographer to his Majesty for Scotland, with a salary of £200 per annum, the appointment having been preceded two years earlier by a proposition from George III. that he should undertake a History of England under the advantages of access to state papers and the receipt of a liberal support. In 1769 he extended his reputation by his History of the Reign of Charles V., 3 vols. 4to, which was received with general applause; in 1777 he gave to the world another successful work, The History of America, Books I.-VIII., 2 vols. 4to, which was followed in 1788 by Additions and Corrections to the former Editions of Dr. Robertson's History of America. Svo, and in 1796 by Books IX. and X., Svo, published under the eye of, but without any alterations by the author's son; in 1791 he published the results of an investigation suggested by Major James Rennell's r., No. 3) Memoir of a Map of Hindoostan, via.; An (q. c., No. 3) Memoir of a supply listorical Disquisition concerning the Knowledge which the Ancients had of India, &c., 4to, a treatise too little known to the present generation of geographers and travellers. not unit to mention that from 1759 until his death he occupied, in conjunction with Dr. John Erskine, the pulpit of the Old Grey-Friars Church, which his father had filled before him; and about this date (1759) he received overtures to enter the Church of England, where, it is believed, his passage to the Episcopal bench would have been sure and rapid. A month or two previous to his decease he was removed to Grange House, near Edinburgh, where his friend Dugald Stewart enjoyed those visits which, fortunately for the world, led to the composition of that charming memoir of the Principal which has been so often praised and so seldom equalled. remains were followed to their resting-place in Grey-Friars Church-yard by a large concourse of the most illustrious magnates of the kingdom, the famous professors of the ancient I siversity, the magistrates of the city, the chiefs of the learned professions, and by many private citizens.—all anxious to testify their respect to the memory of one whose intellectual productions cast so bright a lustre on the record of Scottish letters. In that sorrowing assembly there was a youthful mourner of fifteen years, whose love of knowledge had been stimulated by the zeal and directed by the judgment of the relative whom Scotland that day lamented,—a youth who, after serving his country in its highest civil offices, and carning a world-wide celebrity by his contributions to science, classics, and popular letters, occupies at this day, nearly threescore years and ten since he followed his preceptor to the tomb, (we write in 1860,) the foremost place among his contemporaries : Lord Broughum's mother, Eleanor Syme, eldest daughter of the Rev. Dr. James Syme, was the daughter of Dr. Robertson's How affectionately, how effectively and eloquently, his lockship has paid the debt due to the memory of his emineut relative, is well known to the many readers of the biographical sketch in the Lives of the Men of Letters of the Time of George 111. Robertson left three sons and two daughters. eldest son, Lord William Robertson, we are assured, was only prevented by his duties as a member of the legal profession from equalling his father's literary distinction; and his two younger sons both rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the British army. The Principal's oldest daughter, married to Mr. Putrick Brydone, was the mother-in-law of the Earl of Minto, and the grandmother of Ludy Russell, wife of Lord John Russell, the late Premier. Dr. Robertson's youngest daughter became the wife of John Russell, Esq., Clerk to the Signet. Stewart's account of the Life and Writings of Robertson, originally read in 1796 at different meetings of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and destined for a place in its Transactions, was published with an Appendix in an Svo volume in 1801, and again in 1802, and is prefixed to almost all of the collective editions of Robertson's works. It was last pub., together with the Memoirs of Reid and Smith, in the 10th vol. (1857) of Sir Win. Hamilton's (1994). Roid and Smith, in the total vol. (1887) of the site of Dugald Stewart. (See Lon. Gent. Mag., April, 1858, 407.) It was reviewed by Dr. Thomas Brown in Edin. Rov., ii. 229-249, (see Stewart, DUGALD, Nos. 4, 5.) and notices of it will be found in the Memoirs of the Life of Sir S. Romilly, (see, also, Gent. Mag., Feb. 1841, 130,) in the Life of Sir J. Mackintosh, vol. i. chap. viii., and in Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., in Gent. Mag., Feb. 1834, 113:

III. ROBERTSON'S CHARACTERISTICS AS A HISTORIAN.

I. ROBERTSON THE MAN.

I. ROBERTSON THE MAN.

"The history of the author is the history of the individual, excepting as regards his private life and his personal habits: these were in the most perfect degree dignified and pure. Without any thing of harshness or fanatician, he was rationally plous and blumelessly moral. His conduct, both as a Christian miniater, as a member of society, as a relation, and as a friend, was wholly without a stain. His affections were warm; they were ever under control, and therefore equal and steady. . . . His conversation was cheerful, and it was varied. Vast information, copious anecdote, perfect appositeness of illustration,—marration or description wholly free from pedantry or stiffness, but as felicitous and as artiking as might be expected from such a master,—great liveliness, and often wit, and often humour, with a full disposition to enjoy the merriment of the hour, but in the most scrupulous absence of every thing like coarseness of any description,—

Boswell (see Croker's Boswell's Johnson, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 611, 700) seems to have been unable to discover the wit or wisdom of the Principal's conversation; but Bos-well's great Dominic shut out all others from his vision. Dugald Stewart's testimony confirms that of Lord Brou-

Dugald Stewart a testimony of the was rather above the middle size; and his form, though it did not convey the idea of much activity, announced vigour of body and a healthful constitution. His features were regular and manly, and his eye spoke at once good sense and good humour. He appeared to greatest advantage in his complete cloreal dress; and was more remarkable for gravity and dignity in discharging the functions of his public stations than for ease and grace in private society.—Account, &c.

"He enjoyed the bountes of Providence without running into riot; was temperate without austerity; condescending and was grave, but season, constructions, not timid."—Dr. John Erseine, D.D., Robertson's colleague.

"no enjoyed the bounties of Frontiere without running into it is as temperate without austerity; condescending and affable without meanness; and in expense neither sordid nor produgal. John Erskins, D.D., Robertson's colleague.

"Principal Robertson and his family were very intimate with the family of my father. . . . He was a pleasant-looking old man, with an eye of great vivacity and intelligence, a large, projecting chin, a small hearing-trumpet fastened by a black ribbon to a button-hole of his coat, and a rather large wig, powdered and carled. He struck us boys, even from the side-table, as being evidently fond of a good dinner, at which he sat with his chin near his plate, intent upon the real business of the occasion. This appearance, however, must have been produced partly by his decliness; because, when his eye told him that there was something interesting, it was delightful to observe the animation with which he instantly applied his trampet, when, having caught the scent, he followed it up, and was the leader of the pack."—Lord Occasurs: Memorials of his Time.

CHRIST'S APPEARANCE, AND ITS CONNECTION WITH THE SUCCESS OF HIS RELIGION CONSIDERED: A Sermon preached before the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge, January 6, 1755, Edin., 1755, 8vo; 3d ed., 1759, 8vo; 6th ed., 1791, 8vo. Repub. in Con-LECTIVE EDITIONS OF ROBERTSON'S WORKS, (q. r., infra.) It was reviewed in Edin. Rev., 1755, by Dr. John Jardine.

"This sermon, the only one be ever published, has long been ranked, 'n both parts of the Island, among the best models of pulpit eloquence in our language. It has undergone five editions, and is well known in some parts of the continent in the German translation of Mr. Ebeling."—DUGALD STEWART: ADderman translation of Mr. Ebeling."—DUGALD STEWART: Account, &c.

"The subject of the sermon is one peculiarly suited to his habits of inquiry.... The merits of this piece, as a sermon, are very great; and it is admirable as an historical composition in that department which Voltaire first extended to all the records of past times. It was written and published before the appearance of the 'Essai sur les Mœurs,' though, as has been already said, detached portions of that work had appeared in a Parta periodical work."—Lord Brougham: Lines, &c.

An eminent critic remarks that the causes assigned by Gibbon, in the 15th chapter of the Decline and Fall, for the diffusion of Christianity, "might all be safely adopted by a Christian writer, with some change in the language

by a Christian writer, with some change in the language and manner," and then proceeds to observe,

"This view of the question may derive confirmation, or at least illustration, from comparing Gibbon's two chapters with Dr. Robertson's Sermon on the State of the World at the Time of the Appearance of Christ. The sound and rational observations of the reverend historian on certain facilities afforded to the diffusion of the gospel by the previous state of the public mind and of public affairs, in the hunds of Gibbon, or of any other author more disposed to sneer than to argue candidly on such subjects, would admit of a perversion nearly similar to that given to the accidental causes which he has enumerated; while several of Gibbon's natural causes, changing the offensive language in which they are conveyed, might fairly have been expounded, as perfectly true and efficient, from any pulpit."—

"I have unished a very careful revise of all my works, and have given them the hat polish they will receive from my hand. I have made some additions to each of them, and in the History of Scotland pretty considerable ones. I have desired Mr. Strahan to send you a copy of them uniformly bound, and hope you will accept of them, as a memorial of my esteem and affection."—Dr. Robertsom to Ethaard Gibbon, Feb. 27, 1788: Gibbon's Micrell. Of course the author and publisher of the History of Scotland, and the friends of both, rejoiced together over the astonishing success of the new candidate for public favour:

"I most sincerely wish you joy of your success," writes Mr. Strahan to Robertson. "In truth," he continues, "to acquire such a flood of approbation, writing on a subject in itself so unpopular in this country, is neither a common nor a contemptible

"Bavid Hume so far indulged my impatience as to allow me to carry to the country during the holidays the loose sheets which he happened to have by him. In that condition I read it quite through with the greatest satisfaction, and in much less time than I ever employed on any portion of history of the same length. . . Your work will certainly be ranked in the highest historical class; and, for my own part. I think it, besides, a composition of uncommon genius and cloquence."—Sir Gilbert Elikol to Dr. Robertson, Jan. 20th, 1759.

"I think that the historian of Mary, Queen of Scots, cannot fail to do justice to any great subject. . . . Go on, dear sir, to enrich the English language with more traits of modern history."—Lord Lyttelion to Dr. Robertson, 1769.

"Having fluished the first volume, and made a little progress in the second, I cannot stay till I have fluished the latter to .ell you how exceedingly I admire the work. . . In short, sir, I don't know where or what history is written with more excelences; and when I say this, you may be sure I do not forget your impartiality."—Horace Walpole to Dr. Robertson, Feb. 1750.

"Exbortson's History is, I think, extremely well written."—Bishop Warburton to Hard, Jan. 30, 1759: Letters of a Late Emission Price Lett UXXV.

"Upon my word, I was never more entertained in all my leterand, though I read it aloud to a friend and Mrs. Gagrick, I fluished the three first books at two sittings. I could not help writing to Millar and congratulating him upon his acquisition to his literary treasures."—David Garrick to Dr. Robertson,

"I am very proud of being instrumental in contributing to the translation (by J. B. Suard, infraj of the valuable work you are going to publish. The excellent work you have published already is a sure sign of the reception your History of Charles V. will meet with in the continent."—Baron d'Holbach to Dr. Robertson, Puris, May 30, 1761.

Alas for the expectations of authors! eight years elapsed before Charles the Fifth was ready for the press. Among these enthusiastic admirers of the new History of Scotland, Dr. Johnson claimed no place: "Being solicitous," says Boswell, "for the literary fame of my country, I pressed him for his opinion on the merit of Dr. Robertson's History of Scotland. But, to my surprise, he escaped: 'Sir, I love Robertson; and I won't talk of his book." "—Croker's Boswell's Johnson, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 101. See, also, 182.

The reader must not fail to peruse, what our limits forbid us to lay before him, the critical estimates of the History of Scotland by Dugald Stewart and Lord Brougham: from the latter we quote a few lines:

tory of Scotland by Dugald Stewart and Lord Brougham; from the latter we quote a few lines:

"The rank of the 'Illstory of Scotland' stands very high indeed among the most eminent of historical compositions. The philosophical spirit which pervades it; the enlarged views of polity in which it abounds; the sober and rational, but bold, speculations with which it is variegated, and the constant references to authoritios which accompany it; place it above the works of antiquity, deficient in all these particulars, altogether wanting in son e of them. The skilful and striking delineations of individual character which are mingled with the narrative, but never over lay it, and the reference to the histories of other countries which is introduced whenever it became necessary or instructive, forms another high merit in the work. But it is as a history, and a history of Scotland, that its excention must mainly be regarded, and in this it is truly a great performance."—Men of Letters, dec., 251-252.

"By many thought his best work; and certainly one that comes as near the excellence of ancient historical composition as any production of modern times."—Elin. Rev., bit. 220.

"I think the merit of Robertson consists in a certain owen and well-supported tenour of good sense and elegance. There is a formality and denureness in his manner, his elegance has a prinness, and his dignity a stiffness, which remaind one of the politeness of an old maid of quality standing on all her punctions of propriety and prudery. These peculiarities are most conspicuous in his introductory book. As we advance, his singular power of interesting narrative prevails over every defect. His reflections are not uncommon; his views of character and society imply only sound sense. . . During the trial of Dustersory I had just read, for the thousandth time, efforts more successful than those of the Atmenian Mary, by a vicious and beautiful wife, to murder a bad husband. As soon as Mary gets into England, Robertson is tempted, by the interest of his stor 1811: Life, i. chap. ii.

We have already seen (LAING, MALCOLM, M.P., No. 1, p. 1047, supra) that Sir James had been convinced four years before the date of the above entry of the atrocious guilt of the Queen of Scots. Robertson has been blamed, and probably always will be blamed, by the bigots of both parties on the Marian question, for being a bigot to neither party. Who would suppose, to read the strictures on Robertson's alleged injustice to Mary, in Tytler's Historical and Critical Inquiry, 1759, 8vo, Whittaker's Mary Queen of Scots Vindicated, 1788, 3 vols. 8vo, Gilbert Smart's Public Law and Constitutional History of Scotland, 1779, Svo, his History of the Reformation in Scotland, 1780, 4to, and his History of Scotland, 1782, 2 vols. 4to, that Walpole, Birch, and Lord Chesterfield and even Hume,-to name no more,-detected a decided partiality to Mary?

But some six or seven years ago, when engaged upon the early sheets of this work, (see BUCHANAN, GEORGE, p. 274.) we declined any expression of opinion on the chief indictment against the Scottish Queen, and we have none to offer on the present occasion. Opinions upon this question, and on other questions discussed in Robertson's History of Scotland, will be found in several of the authorities cited at the conclusion of this article. Nor must we omit to direct the attention of the reader to Histoire de Marie Stuart, par Mignet, Paris, 1852, 2 vols. 8vo; Marie Stuart et le Comte de Bothwell, par L. Wiesener, 1865, 8vo; list in Brunet's Manuel, 5th ed., vi. (1865) 1547; Professor Smyth's Lectures on Modern History, (Lect. XXV.;) to Carlyle's review of Boswell's Johnson in (Lect. AAV.;) to Carryie's review of Boswen's Summon in Fraser's Magazine, vol. v., 1832, (repub. in his Miscella-nies,) and especially to a dissertation on Mary, Queen of Scots, by a late eminent American critic, (W. The conclusion of the aritic—that Mary "could not possibly have been accessary to the murder of her husband; in a word, that she was never stained with blood, whatever her subsequent weakness might have been"—is one that we would all be glad to embrace, if it were possible. The sulony of the Empress of Russia we hone to find

The eulogy of the Empress of Russia we hope to find room for on a future page. The ingenious Horace Wal-pole was not behindhand in his tribute. After perusing the first volume he despatched a most culogistic letter to the author, concluding with a protestation which has not failed to excite some amusement since some other letters of the great epistolizer were given to the world. It may indeed be said with some justice that Horace's praises refer rather to the History of Scotland than to the first volume of the new work, the merits of which he had as yet but little time to test. Certain it is that of the latter he subsequently expressed any thing but a flattering opinion. He complains that the historian took every thing on trust, and, when he compiled his Charles I, was in utter ignorance of German and Spanish his fortans."

V., was in utter ignorance of German and Spanish historians."
Again:

"Robertson's reading is not extensive: he only reads what may conduce to the purpose in hand. His introduction to the Ristory of Charles the Fifth abounds with gross mistakes. In mentioning the little intercourse among nations in the middle ages, he says a Prior of Cluny expresses his apprehension of a journey to St. Man. He auposes the Prior's simplicity a standard of the mode of thinking of the time. In many other instances he has mistaken exceptions for rules."

"Lo, there is just appeared a truly classic work: a history, not majestic like Livy, nor compressed like Tacitus; not stamped with character like Clarendon; perhaps not so deep as Robertson's Scotland, but a thousand degrees above his 'Charles.'

"Robertson, if he had applied to Monsieur Gerard of Brussels, keeper of the archives, and many other persons in the America Netherlands, might have procured documents and information which would have rendered the History of Italy something more than a bare splendid relation of facts already known to every common historical reader."—Thicknesse's Journey through the Austrian Notherlands, id. 53.

"I got yesterday from Strahan," writes one of Robertson's most distinguished correspondents, "about thirty sheets of your history to be sent over to Suard. . . . To say only that they are very well written is by far too faint an expression, and much inferior to the sentiments I feel: they are composed with nobleness, with dignity, with elegance, and with Judgmout to which there are few equals. They even excel, and, I think, in a sensible degree, your History of Scotland. I propose to myself great pleasure in being the only man in England during soms months who will be in the situation of doing you justice, after which you may certainly expect that my voice will be drowned in that of the public."—David liums, 1709.

"The prevailing opinion places this work at the head of his writings. . . . But though the same felicitous narrative is in this work always to be iound, and though the first book contains the most perfect example of general and philosophical history anywhere to be seen, yet I hesitate greatly in preferring it as an historical composition to either its predecessor or its immediate successor. There are more remarkable beauties of a purely historical kind in both of these, according to my hamble judgment. As a whole, as a history of a country for a given period, I am much disposed to place his 'Scotland' first; while I consider that the 'America' presents particular passages, feats of narrative oxcollence, unrivalled by any thing in either of the

Let us again reverse the picture. We have seen that Dr. Johnson gave no obscure intimation of his unfavourable opinion of the History of Scotland; he was still more explicit when Boswell teased him for his opinion of Charles the Fifth, ranking the latter lower than Goldsmith's Roman History, published in the same year.

(See Goldsmith's History is better than the verbiage of Robertson or the foppery of Indrymple.' Boswell.—'Will you not admit the superiority of Robertson, in whose history we find such penetration,—such painting?' Johnson.—'Sir, you must consider how that penetration and that painting are employed. It is not history; it is imagination. He who describes what he never saw, draws from fancy. Robertson paints minds as Sir Joshua paints faces in a history-piece: he imagines an heroic countenance. You must look upon Robertson's work as remance, and try it by that standard. History it is not. Besides, sir, it is the great excellence of a writer to put into his book sure, it is the great excellence of a writer to put into his book. Robertson is like a man who has packed gold in wool: the wool takes up more room than the gold. No, sir; I always thought Robertson would be crushed by his own weight,—would be buried under his own ornaments. Goldsmith tells you shortly all you want to know; Robertson's cumbrous detail a second time; but tioldsmith's plain narrative will please again and again. I would say to Robertson what an old tutor of a college said to one of his pupils: "Read over your compositions, and wherevor you meet with a passage which you think is particularly fine, strike it out.""—Bossoell's Johnson, anno 1773. Gilbert Stuart, who, as we have seen, had criticised the History of Scotland with more vigour than courtesy, was well plassed (see his View of Society in Europe, &c., 1778, 4to) in calling the attention of the public to the alleged errors of the History of the Reign of Charles V. But it is the testimony of a respectable historical student

that Robertson's

"fame and authority are, on the whole, rather confirmed than weakened by the animadversions of Stuart; for, with great ability and tearling, and with great eagerness to find fault, his objections are, after all, but few, and of no decisive unportance,"—Prof. Snayth's Lects. on Mod. Dr. Robertson's intended account of the British settlements was suspended "on account of the ferment which then agitated our North American colonies," and he never completed his design: this, we think, is to be regrette. Mr. Charles Francis Adams (N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1831, 177) thinks otherwise. But, before the adduction of any adverse opinions, let us see what we have before us in the way of commendation. The veracious and unsophisticated Lord of Strawberry Hill, of course, was among the first to lay his offerings on the altar. How would the good Principal have felt if he could have read Horace's letter to Mason, describing the visit he had the honour of receiving from the historian, then in search of materials for the reigns of King William and Queen Anne?

of King William and Queen Anne?

"I once wished he should write the History of King William; but his 'Charles V.' and his 'America' have opened my eyes, and the times have shut his. . . . I do not care a straw what he writes about the Church's wet-nurse, Goody Anne; but no Scot is worthy of being the historian of William, but Dr. Watson. [But see Somewille, Thomas, D.D., No. 1.] I have almost finished the first volume of Dr. Robertson. The materials are well put together, and it is a book that must please anyhody to whom the matter is new. In short, it is not all so, and, though the arrangement is good, I see no genius, nor shrewdness; none of that penetration that shone in the 'History of Scotland' and totally left him in his 'Charles V.' . . . There is a great affectation of philosophising, without success. . . . His philosophis colutions are as pairty as possible."—Hornee Mapole to Mason, 1778, and the Countess of Ossory, 1777: Letters, Cunningham's ed., 1861, vi. 445, 451, and vii, 55, 81.

Disruchi does not spare Hornee for his unbandsome

The critic (Gent. Mag., at supra) also refers to a notice of the History of America in the Foreign Quarterly Review, No. xvii., 108-110, remarking, (Gent. Mag., 1836, ii. 20,) "So much for the fame and merits of Dr. Robertson, to which we may add that his style is artificial and resome."

But Charles James Fox was a great purist in language, and he thought "the life of Columbus well written. and he thought "the life of Columbus well written." We presume that it was the History of Charles V. which he thought "very superficial in comparison with Gibbon's History." (Recollections, by S. Rogers, 1859, 24, 31.)

We are assured by Mr. Emerson, on Landor's own suthority, that the "History of America was an early favourite" with that learned and nervous writer. (Emerged's Facility Traits 1957 son's English Traits, 1857, 9.)

The author of the Diary of a Lover of Literature (1810, 4to, 20) compares the style of Robertson's History of America with that of Burke's European Settlements in America, (see p. 289, supra,) to the disadvantage of the Book "is executed in a perspicuous, masterly, and pleasing manner." Lord Brougham, as we have seen, (p. 942, supra,) considers that Robertson's description of the first discovery of land by Columbus is much to be preferred to Washington Irving's; and Prof. Smyth (see the same page) is not disposed to concede to the latter any other advantage in the story of Columbus than the possession of additional materials

How far these then unknown sources of information and new ones since discovered have added to our knowledge of the history of the New World, may, to some extent at least, be seen by reference to the following authorities, where it will be observed that the faults of commission or omission of Dr. Robertson—erring from want of or neglect of materials—are pointed out and rectified: Irving's Life and Voyages of Columbus, ed.

Mr. Prescott prefers the arrangement of Robertson's work to "the slavish adherence to chronology" which embarrasses Herrera and his readers:

"In such a work," he remarks, "we feel the superiority of a plan like that which Robertson has pursued in his 'History of America,' where every subject is allowed to occupy its own independent place, proportioned to its importance, and thus to make a distinct and individual impression on the reader."

Me. Testron's workles is not us for our subject.

Mr. Ticknor's verdict is not so favourable:

"Robertson's History of America, published in 1777, is entirely unequal to the claims it makes. Simancas was closed to him, and the admirable collection at the Lonja of Sewdle was not yet imagined, so that he had not the materials needful for his tack; boddes which, he plan was not only too vast, but, in its separate parts, was ill proportioned and ill adjusted."—Life of Prescott: Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lif., ii, 236.

It will be seen by reference to the Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1858-1860, 277-279, that the eminent critic last quoted defends a statement in Dr. Robertson's History of America against an attack in R. A. The author of the Decline and Fall, who, as we have seen, (RENNELL, MAJOR JAMES, No. 3, supra,) highly valued the Memoir, expected with impatience the publication of the Disquisition:

"I am happy to hear that our respectable friend Dr. Robertson is not asleep; and much do I expect from the subject and the peu. I had once a design not totally unconnected with his own; but it is now in far shier hands."—Gibbon to Cudell, Lausanne, April 27, 1791: Gibbon's Miscell. Works, 386.

Next to that will be the benefit I may derive from your friendly stricture. "Dr. Robertson's book [on India] smused me pretty well, madam, though very defertive from the liatuses in his materials. It is a genealogy with more than half the middle descents wanting; and thence his ingenious hypothesis of Western invaders importing civilization from the East is not ascentained. Can one be sure a peer is descended from a very ancient peer of the same name, though he cannot prove who a dozen of his grandfasticrs were? Dr. Robertson shone when he wrote the history of his own country, with which he was acquainted. All his other works are collections, tacked together for the purpose; but, as he has not the genius, penetration, sugacity, and art of Mr. Gibbon, he cannot melt his materials together and make them elucidate and even improve and produce new discoveries: in short, he cannot, like Mr. Gibbon, make on original pleture with some bits of messic."—Horace Walpole to the Countess of Quarry, Nov. 23, 1791; Letters, ed. 1861 [x. 381].

"It is, from its accuracy, its knowledge of the ancient writings, its judicious reasonings and remarks, as well as its admirable composition, quite worthy of a place by the author's former and more celebrated writings; and it proves his great faculties to have continued in their entito vigent to the latest period of his Mr. . . . Nothing can be more unjust than the notion that this work is so incorrect, or grounded on information so imperfect, as to have been superseded by more full and accurate books since published."—Lord Bacquinus Lives, dv., 272.

If the reader should hastily conclude that this division of our subject has been already exhausted, a glance at our library-table, groaning with "authorities," would undeceive him. But our space, if not our matériel, has laded been exhausted, and we must omit much that we would gladly cite. And here, when the "general cha-testeristics" of our historian are to be considered, we shall be of liged to exhibit the same conflict of learned stities which has already surprised, perhaps embarrassed, we loubt not often amused, him who may be disposed to of Russia,—a bad woman, but a great sovereign, and, what is more to the purpose just now, an intelligent critic.

"Your History of Amorica," writes Dr. Rogerson to the author, "was received and perused by her Imperial Majesty with singular marks of appreciation. All your historical productions have been ever favourite parts of her reading. Not long ago, doing me the honour to converse with me upon historical composition, she mentioned you with particular distinction, and with much admiration of that sagacity and discernment displayed by you in painting the human mind and character, as diversified by the various causes that operated upon it in those zeros and states of secrety which your subject led you to treat. She assigned you the place of first model in that species of composition.

"In regard to style," remarks another intelligent foreign critic, "tew writers of any country can sustam a comparison with Robertson; his expressions are select and elegant, but always clear and unlaboured. But he is very inferior in respect to other matters of far greater importance,—the research and import of his histories. The English themselves are now, pretty well convinced that he is a careless, superficial, and blundering historian, although they study his works, and are right in doing so, as models of pure composition, extremely deserving of attention during the present declining state of English style. (Written in 1812.) To speak from my own feelings, I think Robertson, although upon the whole a beautiful writer, is too fond both of verbosity and of antithesis. The ambition of fine writing, and the desire to treat matters in an elaborate and oratorical manner, appear to me to be extremely erroneous and out of place in a writer of history. If historical composition is to be considered merely as a display of writing, no modern anther need ever flatter himself with the least hope, I do not say of equaling, but of approaching, the great historians of antiquity. . . . Coxe, although master of a good and classic style, resembles Robertson in no respect so much as in the superficulties Robertson in no respect so much as in the superficulties Robertson in no respect so much as in the superficulties of his researches,"—FRED. VON SCREAUEL: Lects. on the Hist. of Lil., Lect. XIV., English trans.

"There is a style which daily game ground amongst us, which I should be sorry to see further advanced by a writer of your just reputation. The tendency of the mode to which I allude is, to establish two very different idioms amongst us, and to metroduce a marked distinction between the English that is written and the English that is writen and the English that is written and the English tha

"Robertson's style, Mr. Prescott remarked, was that of a schoolmistres. He thought him greatly wanting in narrative power, and in the faculty of picturesque description. Ho instanced the bald and commonplace account of the lattice of Pavia as a specimen of Robertson's laability to do justice to a great and splendid subject. At the same time, he did justice to that historian's eminent qualities of another kind,—to his clearnoss, penetration, and philosophic tone. He attributed his defects of style to his age rather than to any defect in himself. The art of writing history had not in English then attained its present remarkable development. Scott and the other novelists have since Robertson's time, initiated the historians into the secret of dramatic and animated narrative and vivid graphic description."—Recollections of Trescott, by his former Secretary: Prescott Memorial, 1859, pp. 21, 22.
"The wa believe that Erasmus and Fracustorius wrote Latin as well as Dr. Robertson and Sir Walter Scott wrote English? And are there not in the Dissertation on India, the last of Dr. Robertson's Works, in Waverley, in Marmion, Scottleims at which a London apprentice would laugh? ... Not one Londoner in ten thousand can lay down the rules for the proper use of will and shall. Tet not one Londoner in a million ever misplaces his will and shall. The not one Londoner in a million ever misplaces his latest work, he sometimes misplaced them Indicrously,"—LORD MccVULAT: Crd. and Hist. "Robertson's style, Mr. Prescott remarked, was that doubted of its great excellence; but it has sometimes been objected to as leas idiomatic and more laboured than it consistent with the perfection of composition. The want of parely idiomatic expressions is the almost unavoidable consequence of provincial education and habits. Many forms of speech, which are peculiarly English, are almost entirely unknown in the remote parts of the kingdom; many, which are perfectly pure and classical, a person living in Scotland would fear to use, as doubting their correctness. That Robertson, however, had carefully studied the heat writers, with a view to acquire gonuine Anglician, cannot be doubted. "Lions Braconars. Lices, &c. 172, 273.

"In concluding this general review of Dr. Robertson's publications, our attention is naturally led, in the first place, to the extent and variety of his historical researches. In this respect, he has cortainly not been surpassed by any writer of the present times; nor would it perhaps be easy to name another who has united to so luminous an arrangement of his materials, and such masterly skill in adorning them, an equal degree of industry and exactness in tracing them to their original sources. After a minute examination of the most disputed passages of his first porformance, a late author [Mr. Lung] has ventured to pronounce him 'the most faithful of historians;' and I have no doubt that this benourable appellation will be sanctioned by those who shall examine his other works with the same acuteness, accuracy, and condour.

doubt that this honourable appetiation will be sanctioned by those who shall examine his other works with the same acutencess, accuracy, and candour.

"In the art of narration, too, which next to correctness in the statement of facts is the most essential qualification of an historian, Dr. Robertson's skill is pre-eminent: perhaps I might venture to say that in this art his chief and characteristic excellence as an historian consists. . . The general strain of his composition is flowing, equal, and mighestic harmonious beyond that of most English writers, yet seldom deviating, in quest of harmony, into inversion, redundancy, or affectation. . . Perhaps on the whole it will be found that, of all his performances. Charles V, is that which unites the various requisites of good writing in the highest degree. The style is more natural and flowing than that of the History of Scothand; while, at the same time, dhomatical phrases are introduced with so spashing and timid a hand, that it is easy to perceive the author's attention to correctness was not sensibly diminished. In the History of America, although it contains many passages equal, if not superior, to any thing else in his writings, the composition does not seem to me to be so uniformly polished as that of his former works; nor does it always possess in the same degree the recommendations of conciseness and simplicity."—Dugala Strwart Account, &c.

of Moral Philosophy:

"The histories of Robertson abound in the finest descriptions, the most pleasing delineations of character, the most dignified and judicious mixture of reflections; and more especially they are distinguished by a style of narration at once manly, explous, and easy. But all these descriptions, delineations, reflections, and even this narrative itself, are too general for practical use and application. The politician and political economist will search these writings in vain for the accurate details of fact which they have a right to expect from one who investigates the subjects of particular men and nations, . . In plan terms, Dr. Robertson appears to have studied grace and dignity more than usefulness. He has chosen those features of every figure which he could best paint, rather than those which were most Dr. Robertson appears to have studied grace and dignity more than usefulness. If has chosen those features of every figure which he could best paint, rather than those which were most worthy of the pencil. . . . The charms of Robertson's style, and the inil flow of his narration, which is always sufficiently minute for ordinary readers, will render his works immortal in the hands of the bulk of mankind. But the scientific reader requires something more than periods which fill his ear, and general statements which gratify by anusing; he even requires more than a general text-book,—a happy arrangement of intricate subjects, which may enable him to pursue them in their details. . . When we repair to the works of Robertson for the purpose of finding facts, we are instantly carried away by the atream of his narrative, and forget the purpose of our errand to the fountain. As soon as we can stop ourselves, we discover that our search has been vain, and that we must apply to those sources from which he drew and culled his supplies."—Da. Tsomas Brown: Elia. Rev., April, 1803, 240, 241.

"Inferior probably to Mr. Gibnon in the vigour of his powers, unequal to him perhaps in comprehension of intellect and variety of knowledge, the Scottish historian has far surpassed him in simplicity and perspicuity of narrative, in picturesque and pathetic description, in the soler use of figurative language, and in the delicate perception of that scarcely discernible boundary which separates ornament from exulerance and elegance from affectation. He adorns more chastely in addressing the imagination, he narrates more clearly for the understanding, and he describes more feelingly for the heart. The defects of Dr. Robertson arise from a less vigorous intellect; the faults of Mr. Gibbon, from a less pure taste. If Mr. Gibbon be the greater mm. Dr. Robertson is the better writer."—Six James Mackinyosa: Low. Month. Reviews.

Speaking of the style of Burnet's Own Times, Charles Lamb remarks, "None of Dr. Robertson's periods with three members." (Lamb's Letters.)

"In Adam Smith's day all poetical criticism not configured in Dr. Blair's Lectures or Lord Kames's Elements would have been bouted out of reasonable sediety; now those books thembolves; and the school which they represent, have sunk into the lowest estimation. Robertson and Humo would of course have been Smith's standards of instotical writing; now the world can lagen with great complacency to Churles Lamb's assertion that fileir books have the same tell to the character of histories as the chess-boards which we see inscribed in gilt letters with the same honourable name,"—REV. It will be remembered that Gibbon himself in 1779 calls Robertson "the first historian of the present age," (Gibbon's Miscell. Works, 713;) and Robertson, in 1788, admitted that he himself was, before Gibbon took the field, "the most illustrious historian of the age," (ut supra, 882;) and Gibbon's culogistic notices of the various excellencies of Hume and Robertson (us supra, 55, 69, 257, and Hume, David, p. 917, col. 2, supra) must not be forgotten.

"I will frankly own," he writes at a later date, "that my pride is elated as often as I find myself ranked in the triumvinate of British historiums of the present age; and, though I feel myself the Lepidus, I contemplate with pleasure the superiority of my colleagues,"—Gibbon to Robertson, London, Sept. 1, 1783; Stess-cuth Account die art's Account, de.

Five years later, he writes,

"The praise which has ever been the most flattering to my ear is to find my name associated with the names of Robertson and Hume; and provided I can maintain my place in the trimmvirate I am indifferent at what distance I am ranked below my companions and masters."—Gibbon to Robertson, London, March 26, 1788. Newart's Account, dv.

Robertson was not behindhand in civility; and his deliberate judgment of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, after the careful perusal of the whole work, is well worth recording on this page:

"When I consider the extent of your undertaking, and the immense labour of historical and philosophic research requisite towards executing every part of it, I am astorished that all this should have been accomplished by one man. I know no example, in any age or nation, of such a vast body of valuable and elegant information communicated by any individual."—Robertson & Gibbon, Edinburgh, July 30, 1788; Gibbon's Miscell. Whilst on this theme, we feel tempted to cite a few lines on Hume and Robertson by the ancient censor of the latter,-remarkable, if for nothing else, from the fact of their having been buried in a lost manuscript for the last fourscore venra:

Robinson, Edward, S.T.D., D.D., LL.D., b. April 10, 1794, in Southington, Conn., where his father (see No. 14, infra) was for forty-one years paster of the Congregational Church, graduated at Hamilton College with the highest honours in 1816, and from October, 1817, to October, 1818, was tutor in mathematics and Greek in the same institution. In the autumn of 1818 he married the youngest sister of the late President Kirkland, and was called to mourn her loss in July of the following was called to mourn her loss in July of the following year. In December, 1821, he went to Andover, in order to carry through the press a manual for college instruc-tion,—the first Books of the Iliad, with Latin Notes, selected chiefly from Heyne. While there, he commenced the study of Hebrew, and a year later was employed, the second edition of Professor Moses Stuart's Hebrew Grammar, (Andover, 1823, 8vo.) and soon afterwards became his associate in the preparation of the same edition. From 1823 to 1826 he acted as assistant to Professor Stuart in the chair of Sacred Literature at the Theological Seminary at Andover; from June, 1826, to 1830, pursued his studies and observations chiefly in Halle, (where, in 1828, he married the youngest daughter of Professor Ludwig H. von Jakob: see Rosinson, Miss. Edward,) and also in Berlin, and other parts of Europe; was Professor Extraordinary of Sacred Literature at Andover Theological Seminary, 1830-1833; resided in Boston, 1833-1837; and from 1837 until his death, Jan. 1863, was Professor of Biblical Literature in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. In 1838, in conjunction with the Rev. Eli Smith, of the Beyrout Mission, he made that remarkable exploration of Palestine, the results of which, digested by two years' diligent labour at Berlin, (1838-40,) and given to the world in 1841, to borrow the language of Carl Ritter, opened "the second green era of our knowledge of the Promised Land."

In 1852 the same intelligent travellers (Dr. Robinson performed part of the journey with other companions) revisited Jerusalem, and extended their investigations so far beyond the field surveyed on their former tour that, to the one hundred and twenty ancient places then first identified and described, about fifty more such localities were added. These Later Researches were published in 1858. Having thus given a rapid sketch of the prominent points in the life of this accomplished scholar, (the reader should also consult the notices in Griswold's Prose Writers of America. 4th ed., 1852, 18, 25, 39, 43, 382, and Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit., 1856, ii. 167, and Supp., 34, 51,) we proceed to present a chronological list of his publications, accompanied with critical notes.

1. With STUART, MOSES, A Greek Grammar of the New Testament; trans. from the German of G. B. Winer, Andover, 1825, r. 8vo.

"This is an ably-executed translation of the first edition [Leipzig, 1822] of the preceding work: it is, however, now completely supersoded by the following work of Professor Stuatt: A Grammar of the New Testament Dialect, Andover, 1834-1841, 8vo; London, 1838, 8vo. [See Stuart, Moses, Nos. 8, 18.]"—Horac's Hibk Bib., 1830, 200.

In 1839, and again in 1850, appeared Winer's Grammar of the Idioms of the Greek Language of the New Testament, (from the 4th German ed., 1836,) trans. by J. M. Agnew and O. G. Ebbeke, N. York, 8vo; and in 1859, A Grammar of the New Testament Diction, from Winer's 6th ed., traus. by Edward Masson, Edin. and Phila., 8vo, pp. x., 708, (noticed in N. Amer. Rev., April, 1860, 546, by Charles Short.) A translation of Winer's Grummar of the Chaldee Language, with Additions, by Horatio B. Hackett, was pub. at Andover, 1845, 8vo. 2. Greek and English Loxicon of the New Testament, from the Clavis Philologica of Chris. Abraham Wahl, Andover, 1825, r. 8vo. The improvements of the translator make this a new Lexicon of the New Testament: Wahl's texts are verified and corrected, many of the definitions are framed de novo from the New Testament, and illustrations are added from Schleusnor and others, (see Horne's Bibl. Bib., 213. But, good as this Lexicon is, it has long been superseded by No. 9, infra. 3. Biblical Repository, N. York and Andover, 8vo, 1831-31, 4 vols., odited and written chiefly by Dr. Robertson. This work, established by Dr. Robertson, is still continued, (see its history, and that of the allied periodicals, in Trübner's Bibl. Guide to Amer. Lit., 1859, 48.) Dr. R. has assisted in some of the later vols. of the collection. It consists of Essays and Tracts, original and translated, (especially from the German,) connected with Biblical literature and theology. It attracted great attention among European Biblical scholars.

"It delights me and all my Cambridge and other friends to find that our American seighbours are really outstripping us in the cause of Biblical literature."—Samuel Les, Hebrow Prof.

Univ. Cumb., 1831.

univ. Camb., 1831.

"Should you succeed in a sking the contents of your Bepository hereafter as rich and valuable as they have been hitherto, it will become a classical book for the study of theology in America, and will be the commencement of a new era."—Frof. Theluck, of Halle, to Dr. Robinson.

It is interesting to compare with this Freiace that of fifteen years later:

"With this volume closes, of course, the record of my personal observations in the Holy Land. The principles according to which it has been prepared are the same with those which lie at the basis of my former work. If it shall be attended to the worthy supplement to that work, I shall be satisfied. To these my Biblical Researches in the Holy Land, the fruit of thirty gears of preparation, and of personal travels in 1838 and 1852, I can hope to add nothing more. The work is now published as a whols, and it's permanent form. It will be seen by the Map that the routes of the different years rarely coincide."—Author's Partice.

"The tour of Dr. Robinson and Smith in Palestine in 1852 was far from being a repetition of the tour of 1858. With the exception of a single excursion into the vicinity of Hebron, the manexhibits no trace of the second tour south of Jerusalem. The scenes of the second exploration were mainly Galidee and the regions cast and west of the great northern read leading from Jerusalem to Nabulus... Dr. Robinson's researches, it will be understood, are but preliminary to the preparation of a Biblical Geography..., it is devoutly to be wished that the life and health of Dr. Robinson may be spared to complete this cherished object of years of toil."—J. Robinson, John, 1575-1625, a native of England, educated at the University of Cambridge, began his ministerial labours in the vicinity of Norwich in the Established Church, but was suspended by the bishop for nonconformity in ceremonials; gathered at Norwich a congregation of Puritans, and, with a number of those like-minded, settled at Amsterdam in 1608, and at Leyden in 1609; dismissed a portion of his flock to Plymouth, New England, July 22, 1620, with the intention of fol-lowing them, but never reached "the haven where he would be," and continued in the exercise of his ministerial functions at Leyden; was followed to the grave by his fellow-members of the University, the ministers and "chief cetates" of that mother of learned men; but will live in the grateful momory of millions of the lovers of civil and religious freedom to the end of time.

He was the author of a number of controversial and devotional treatises, which were published collectively:
The Works of John Robinson, Pastor of the Pilgrim
Fathers, with a Memoir and Annotations by Robert Ashton, Secretary of the Congregational Board, Lon.
and Bost., 1831, 3 vols. 12mo. Reviewed in Eclec. Rev., 4th Ser., xxxi. I, (copied in Internat. Mag., March, 1852, 867.) In vol. i. will be found an account of the descendants of Robinson, (his sons John and Isaac emigrated to New England in 1629 or 1630,) from the pen of Dr. Allen, of Northampton, Mass., from which it appears that they or Normampton, Mass., from which it appears that they are very numerous, scattered over New England and other States of the Union, and occupying respectable and useful stations in life. " He was a man not easily to be paralleled for all things, whose , 1878 singular virtues we shall not take upon us here to describe. Neither need we, for they so well are known both by friends and enemies. . . He was very profitable in his ministry, and comfortable to his people. He was much beloved by them, and so loving was he unto them, and entirely sought their good for soul and body."—GOYERROR BRADFORD.

Robinson, Robert, 1735-1790, a native of Swaft-ham, Norfolk, after studying with great zeal and success at the Grammar-School at Scarning, in his 15th year was apprenticed to a hair-dresser in London, who kindly gave up his indentures when, after five years' application, he declared his preference for the pulpit. At the ago of nineteen he commenced preaching among the Methodlets, and renounced present support and a fortune in re-version, proffered by a rich relation, when thus tempted to dissolve his connection with the Dissenters. After to assoive his connection with the Dissenters. After two years' experience in his new position, he associated with several others in the formation of an Independent Society in Norwich; but shortly afterwards (in 1759) he accepted the charge of a Baptist congregation at Cam-bridge; and in 1773 his insufficient support obliged him to add to his pastoral labours the business of farming and traffic in corn and coals. His leisure hours were dovoted to study, pursued to great advantage by aid of the Cambridge libraries; and during the last eighteen years of his life he pub. a number of works, of which the following are the most important: 1. Sermons from the Original French of the Late Rev. James Saurin, [two in 1770,] 1775-84, 5 vols. Stephen Blackhead and Robert Young, 1692, 8vo.

Rochester, John Wilmot, Earl of, 1647 or 1648 -1680, the son of Henry, Earl of Rochester, and educated at Wadham College, Oxford, returned from his travels in France and Italy in his 18th year; in 1665, and again in 1666, distinguished himself in naval engagements against the Dutch; attached himself to the court, where he was noted for drunkenness, buffoonery, and poetry; towards the close of his life felt compunctions for his past sourse, and, through the innuence of Bishop Burney, left the world a sincere penitent, and a firm believer in the truths and a joyful participator of the consolutions of the "everlasting gospel."

Burnet's Life of this nobleman has been noticed on a ast course, and, through the influence of Bishop Burnet, there was published, professedly at Antwerp, really at London, a volume, 8vo, purporting to contain his Poenga on Several Occasions; reprinted, Lon., 1685, 8vo. (Bibl., Anglo-Poet, No. 623, £5 5s.) We also notice his Poenga 1691, 8vo; 1696, 8vo; his Familiar Letters, 1697, 8vo; his Works (1702, 200, 2) and 1707, 24 of 1707 his Works, (1702,) 8vo; 2d ed., 1707; 3d ed., 1713, 8vo; 1714, 12mo, (Bibl. Anglo-Poet., No. 624, £1 1a.;) his Remnius, 1718, 12mo; his Poetical Works, with those of the Earls of Roscommon and Dorset, the Dukes of Devonshire, Buckinghamshire, &c., with Memoirs of their Lives, 1731-32, 2 vols. 12mo. Poems, with those of Edmund Waller, 18mo. See, also, editions in Bohn's Lowndes, 2114. But which of the poems thus ascribed.

Lowndes, 2714. But which of the poems thus assertoed to Rochester are really his it is impossible to decide:
"There is no good edition of Rochester's Poems: that professedly printed at Antwerp in the year in which he died is scarce and dear, but contains much that he never wrote; the still more obscene edition, 2 vols., 1731-2, fetches a still larger price, but is not to be relied on. The castrated editions are common enough, but too incomplete."—PETER CUNKINGHAM, in his ed. of Johnson's Layes of the Poets, 1854, i. 182. See Index.

As regards the first edition, 1680, "Of some of the pieces, however, there is no doubt. The 'Imitation of Horace's Satire,' the 'Vorses to Lord Mulgrave,' the 'Satire against Man,' the 'Verses upon Nothing,' and perhaps some others, are, I believe, genuine, and perhaps most of those which this collection exhibits."—Dr. Johnson: Lives of the English Dreit Park of the dominic upon the merits of those which he accepts as genuine?

This does not help us much. But what is the verdict of the dominie upon the merits of those which he accepts.

"His songs have no particular character: they tell, like other songs, in smooth and easy language, of scorn and kindness, dismission and describen, abe me and inconstancy, with the commonplaces of artificial courtship. They are commonly smooth and easy, but have little nature and little sentiment. His indication of Horace on Lucilius is not inelegant or unhappy.... The strongest effort of his muse is his poem upon 'Nothing.'... Of the sature against Man, Rochester can only claim what remains when all Boilean's part is taken away. In all his works there is a sprightliness and vigour, and everywhere may be found tokens of a mind which study might have carried to excellence."—Boil.

"Bochester, in his Satire on Man, very much improves on found tokens of a mind which study might have carried to excellence."—bid.

"Ruchester, in his Satire on Man, very much improves on his pattern in Boileau. Horace's Supper, Boileau's Festin, and Rochester's Poast, all very good. Kochester has notther so much delicacy or exactness as Lord Dorset."—Pover. Spence's Anacdotes, ed. 1820, fol. 63, 136. See, also, 5, 19, 200, 220; OLD-RIM, Johns, (quotation from Pope.)

"Lord Rochester's poems have much more obscenity than wit, more wit than poetry, more poetry than politoness."—Horace Walfords. R. and N. Authors, Park's ed., in. 234.

"This lord's licentious productions too forcibly warrant the sentence of outlawry that decoroum and taste have passed upon them."—Thowas Park, ibid. 244.

"I remember I heard him [Andrew Marvell] say that the Earl of Rochester was the only man in England that had the true vein of satire."—Ausner Lives, iii. 433.

"The very name of Rochester is offensive to modern cars; yet does his poetry discover such energy of style and such poignancy of satire, as give ground to imagine what so fine a genius, had he fallen in a more happy age and had followed better models, was capable of producing."—Hurz: Hist. of Eng., ch. laxi.

"Wilmot Earl of Rochester was naturally modest, till the court corrupted him. His wit had in it a peculiar brightness, both Greek and Latirf; a thing very rare (if not peculiar to him) among those was . . . thoroughly acquainted with the classic authors, both Greek and Latirf; a thing very rare (if not peculiar to him) among those of his quality."—Wood. Bibl. Man., Bohn's ed., 175; MATTHEW, THOMAS.

"How much of this Translation had been accomplished by Tyndale before his arrest, [in or about March, 1586,] and how much was done solely by liogers, or how far the latter availed himself of the published labours of Coverdials, are questions that cannot now be satisfactorily or minutely answered.... Apart from the labour of placing the text in a complete state and probably comparing every verse with the original, there was a vast amount of mental effort to be bestowed upon the marginal illustrations which he added, as well as upon the response and other articles prefixed to the whole work and to individual portions of it. The Marginal Notes alone would fall a volume of considerable magnitude; and there is no reason to suppose that he had any immediate assistance in their pre-paration... One thing, therefore, may be said with entire cortainty; that, if Rogers is not entitled to be regarded as the sole author of the first English Translation of the Bible, it may be claimed for him that he prepared and published the first general English Commentary upon it, and thus led the way for his numerous successors in that class of Biblical literature."— JOSEPH LEMUEL CHESTER: John Rogers: the Compiler of the First Authorized Ibble; the Promer of the English Reformation, and its First Martyr, Lon., 1861, 30, 40, 48. Rogers also inserted in this Bible A table of the pryn-eynall matters contaying in the Riyble, in which the cypall matters conteyned in the Byble, in whych the readers may finde and practy to many commune places. This occupies 26 pp. Of this table the hiographer just quoted remarks,

"As he was the author of the first general English Commentary upon the Bible, so was he also the author of the first Eng-lish Concordance; and his claims to these titles can no longer be disregarded or disallowed."— Chi supra, $1.

See, also, 134-139 for notices of other literary compositions attributed to Rogers. But, indeed, those who seek for a correct portraiture of the martyr must carefully examine the whole of Mr. Chester's excellent biography, the first one which has done justice to its venerated subject, (see Proceed. Mass. Hist. Soc., 1860-62, 1862, 8vo, 486-99; Lon. Athen., 1862, ii. 239;) and, with this book as a guide, he can profitably extend his researches to Foxe's Acts and Monuments, Strype's Cranmer, and Biographia Britannica. The number of his children has been a fruitful cause discussion; but Foxe, who knew the family well, is sufficiently explicit:

hath ten children which are hers and mine;" but the good man was confined for more than a year in Newgate, but the and his eleventh child arrived in his absence; or, if otherwise, the father of so many children may be excused for momentarily forgetting the new number.

Rogers, Samuel, July 30, 1763-Dec. 18, 1855, the son of a London banker, and a lineal descendant by his mother of the learned and excellent Philip Henry,

the father of the commentator, was born at Newington

Green, a suburb of London. "It is, no doubt, to his maternal descent," remarks his nephew, Mr. William Sharpe, "that he alludes in the following lines, bitroduced into the notes on the poem of Italy:

What though his ancestors, early or late,
Were not ennobled by the breath of kings;
Yet in his veius was running at his birth
The blood of those most eminent of old
For wisdom, virtue—those who would renounce
The things of this world for their conscience' sake."

Mr. Sharpe continues:

"Although introduced when very young into his father's business, his love of poctry was shown early. Long before he was twenty, he had put upon paper many liuse which afforded promise of his subsequent performances. His first published poem, the 'Odo to Superstion,' was begun before he was of age; and the 'Pleasures of Memory' appeared while he was still a working partner in the tank.

"liaving lost his father in 1703, whose death-hed he has touchingly alluded to in his 'Lines written in a Sick Chamber,' and having united with him in bushuess his younger brother, Henry, he soon afterwards retired from all active management of the affairs of the banking-house, and never resumed it. He quitted his paternal residence at Newington Green, where he was born and had spent the whole of his carry hie, and, after living a short time in 'chambers' in the Temple, he removed, about 1803, to a house in St. James's Place, looking into the Green Park. This house he had altered and nearly rebuilt according to his own taste, and in it he resided until his death, or the 18th of Docember."—Project o Recollection by Samuel Ropers, 1809.

To this biographical preface, and to several sources to

To this biographical preface, and to several sources to be indicated below, we refer the indulgent student who is disposed to forgive in us that brevity of narratives which our limited space renders imporative. The many attractions of the "house in St. James's Place," referred to by Mr. Sharpe, were long familiar to many of our readers. That the well-known mansion lacked the greatest of all attractions—that a poet's wife sat not at the head of all attractions—that a poet's wife sat not at the head of the poet's famous breakfast-table—would seem to have been the fault of the neglectful master hinself.

"His own version of the nearest approximation to the nuptial tie was, that, when a young man, he admired and sedulously sought the society of the most beautiful girl be then and still thought he had ever seen. At the end of the London season, at a ball, she said, 'I go to-morrow to Worthing. Are you coming there?' He did not go. Some months afterwards, being at Ranclagh, he saw the attention of every one drawn towards a large party that had just entered, in the centre of which was a lady on the arm of her hudsand. Stepping forward to see this wonderful beauty, he tound it was his love. She merely said, 'You never came to Worthing.' — Edinburgh Review, July, 1856.

And probably, if he had, he would have returned from "Worthing" as he went,—or not much enriched had he brought back a bride: certainly there seems to have been no heart-breaking on either side. It is possible, indeed, no heart-breaking on either side. It is possible, indeed, that the same want of confidence which kept the young poet from Dr. Johnson's presence when there was only a door between thom-a door, too, which he had anxiously sought—may have kept the young lover from Worthing, But, leaving these unprofitable speculations, we proceed to an enumeration, chronologically arranged, of Mr. Rogers's publications, premising that they were preceded by a series of eight papers, entitled The Scribbler, which the curious will find in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1781, pp. 68, 119, 168, 208, 259, 305, 353, and 405. first number is signed S R**.

It will be remembered that in his English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, pub. in 1809, the noble critic pronounces The Pleasures of Memory, The Pleasures of Hope, and the Essay on Man " the most beautiful didactic poems in our language." This eulogy of the contemporary poet is not to be ascribed to the enthusiasm of friendship: it was two years later when Byron, Moore, Campbell, and Rogers met—it was at the table of the latter—for the first time. This dinner-party was graphically described by the host to Mr. E. ard Everett, and by Mr. Everett the story was sommunicated, with other interesting particulars respecting Lord Byron, to the author of this Dictionary, by whom the narrative was given to the public in the life of Lord Byron in the first volume of this work.

"Melodious Rogers"-for so his lordship styled him was always a great favourite with the author of Childe Harold. In 1813 he dedicated to him his tale of The Gisour, "as a slight but most sincere token of admiration for his genius, respect for his character, and gratitude for his friendship;" in the same year he ranks him second only to Scott among living poets, and endorses the high esti-mate which Sir James Mackintosh (article on Rogers's Poems, 1812, Svo, in Kdin. Rov., Oct. 1813, places on the author of The Pleasures of Memory. See Byron's Diary, Nov. 27, 1813, in Moore's Life of Byron, vol. i.:) and in the next year Byron's poem of Lara was published in the same volume (Lara, a Tale; Jacqueline, a Tale, 1814, 12mo) with Rogers's Jacqueline.

"The 'Pleasures of Memory," he remarked, nine years later, to Lady Blessington, "is a very beautiful poem, harmonous, finished, and chaste; it contains not a single meretricious ornament. If Rogers has not fixed homself in the higher fields of Parmassus, he has, at least, cultivated a very pretty flower-garden at its base."—("onersations with Lord Byron, ed. Boston, 1860, 334. See, also, 335.

"We are all wrong," he exclaimed, on another ocea. "except Rogers, Crabbe, and Campbell;" and his invoontion, from which we have already borrowed two words, will be another repetition:

norner reputation:
And thou, metodious Rogers, rise at last!
Recall the pleasing memory of the past;
Arise! let blest remembrance still inspire
And strike to wonted tones thy hallowed lyre:
Restore Apollo to his vacant throne,
Assert thy country's honour and thine own."

We continue our quotations:

Assert thy country's honour and thine own."

We continue our quotations:

"It is not uninteresting, even as a matter of speculation, to observe the fortunes of a poem which, like the Pleasures of Memory, appeared at the commencement of the literary revolution, without paying court to the revolutionary tastes or socking distinction by resistance to them. . . No production so popular was probably ever so little censured by criticism. It was approved by the critics as much as read and applanded by the people, and thus seemed to combine the applanse of contemporaries with the suffrage of the representatives of Posterity."—Sis J. Mackinsons: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1813, 38, 39: republin his Miscell. Works, ed. 1854, ii. (12.

"Rogers's Pleasures of Memory has one good line,—
"The only pleasures we can call our own."

"It is remarkable that this pen is very popular. A new edition of its printed every year. It brings the author in about £200 per annum; and yet its principal merit is its fluished versification, which one would think the people could hardly enjoy. The subject, however, recommends fredt very much to all claves of readers."—Sir J. Mackinosh; Conversations with A. H. Everell, 1817: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1832, 447, n.

"The Pleasures of Memory ends thus:

'Hall, Memory, hall in thy exhaustless mine.'...

Quoted to hat line inclusive,
"There are the lines which Mackintosh, thereby giving the measure of his own poetic feeling, used to say were equal to the closing lines of the bunchad."—Evin. Rev., July, 1854.

"There is the 'Pleasures of Memory,' an clegant, graceful, beautiful, pensive, and pathetic poem, which it does one's eyes good to gaze on, one's ears good to listen to, one's very fingers good to gaze on, one's ears good to listen to, one's very fingers good to gaze on, one's ears good to listen to, one's very fingers good to gaze on, one's ears good to listen to, one's very fingers good to gaze on, one's ears good to listen to, one's very fingers good to gaze on, one's ears good to listen to, one's very fing good to totte, as amooth is the versiteation and the wire-wove paper. Nevor will the 'Pleasures of Mennery' be forgotton til the world is in its dotage."—Professor Wilson: Recolleg. of Okristopher North.

See, also, a favourable notice of The Pleasures of Mennory in Blackw. Mag., iv. 553.

"The Pleasures of Mennory, a poem exquisite in conception and execution, combining a fine teching of nature and a high tone of morality, with elegant scholarship and a nicety of taste approaching to fastithourness.... It is pervaded by beauty and grace of sentiment, and in versification approaches the perfection of art."—Morie: Skielbes, dec.

"In the Pleasures of Memory we are forcibly reminded of Goldsmith and the Deserted Village. We feel how deeply the gonius of that oxquisite writer had affected the mind of Rogers in his youth. There is a striking similarity of style, of imagery, and ig subject.... Out of the Pleasures of Memory sprung the Pleasures of Hope. The direct initiation of both style, manner, subject, and cast of subject, by Campbell, is one of the most striking shings in the language; the peculiarities of the style and phraseology only, as was natural by an enthusiastic youth, much exaggerated."—Howill's Homes and Hauste of the More Eminest Briefish Poets, (q, r.)
"He is a very lady-like poet. He is an elegant but feeble writer. He wraps up obvious thoughts in a glittering cover of fine words; it is fall of enigmas with no meaning to them; is accupalously inverted, and accupatiously far-fetched; and his verses are poetry cliefly because on particle, line, or syllable of them reads like prose.... You cannot see the thought for the sambiguity of the language, the figure for the finery, the pictures for the varasish. The whole is refined and frittered away into an appearance of the most evanescent brilliancy and tremulous labeclifity. There is no other fault to be found with the Pleasures of Memory than a want of taste and genius."—

See, also, Blackw. Mag., April, 1818, 72. "Hazlitt, with something of that perversences which even talent is not without, said the chief fault of Engers was want of genius and taste. Perhaps in the whole list of living men of genius no one can be named whose taste in poetry is so just and delicate."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Fears, (1833.)

A substantial advantage of the fame which followed the publication of The Pleasures of Memory was the acceptable of the standard of the contribution of The Pleasures of Memory was the acceptable of the standard of the s quisition of many valuable acquaintances; and of these no one was esteemed more highly by the poet than Charles James Fox, to whose memory he remained faithful every year and day of his prolonged life. Fox sat chief among the guests at the "house-warming dinner" when, in 1803, Rogers moved to his mansion in St. James's Place; the poet celebrated the funeral of his illustrious friend "in ome of the best-turned and most tender of his verses, in 1806; and thirteen years later (in the poem of Human Life) he pensively records the happy hours he had enjoyed with the patriot in the "loved retreat" where the genius of Shakspeare or of Dryden southed the excite-ments of party and banished the demon of play.

3. An Epistle to a Friend, with other Poems, 1798, 4to. 4. POEMS: INCLUDING FRAGMENTS OF A POEM CALLED THE VOYAGE OF COLUMBUS, 1812, 8vo, pp. 276. The first poem in this collection is our old friend The Pleasures of Memory: this poem was noticed in reviews of No. 4 by Mr. Ward (afterwards Lord Dudley) in Quarterly Review, March, 1813, (see, also, Dec. 1840, 96,) and by Sir J. Mackintosh in Edinburgh Roview, October, 1813: the Voyage of Columbus is praised with warmth and without deductions by the latter, moderately and with qualifications by the former. Rogers, who was by no means indifferent to adverse criticism, was foolish enough to be annoyed by Ward's freedom, and unwise enough to revenge himself for no injury by a tart epigram and an ill-natured wittieism.

A complimentary reference to the Voyage of Columbus will be found in Prescott's History of the Conquest of

5. Lara; a Tale, [by Lord Byron, ut supra;] JACQUELINE; a Tale, 1814, 12mo; N. York, 1814, 12mo. In his review of Byron's Corsair and Lara, in the Quarterly Review, July, 1814, George Ellis expresses his surprise that the latter was "ushered into the world in company with the highly-refined, but somewhat insipid, pastoral tale of Jacqueline:" we regret to add that Rogers here again displayed his weakness by indignation, not carefully concealed, at the honest reviewer. We have already in very plain terms consured the school-boy petulance which so often disgraces criticised authorship, (see Jer-FREY, FRANCIS, p. 961, col. 1:) it occurs to us to quote a few lines, indicative of a very contrary spirit, from a letter addressed to us by a late eminent essayist and historian less than a twelvementh before the world was called to mourn his sudden decease:

"Everybody has a right to blame me for what I have written; nor shall I ever complain of the freedom with which that right is exercised.
"Holly Lodge, Kensington,
"January 29, 1859."

How far beyond "the limits of becoming" criticism the assaults upon some of this writer's positions have been carried, the intelligent reader can hardly need to be informed.

"These are very sweet verses. They do not indeed, atir the spirit like the strong lines of Byron, nor make our hearts dance within us, like the inspiring strains of Scott; but they come over us with a bewitching softness that, in certain moods, is still more delightful, and soothe the troubled spirits with a refreshing sonse of truth, purity, and elegance."—Load Jeffars: Edin. "A most 'pathetic and moral poem;' as capable as any work of tasts can be, of fixing the inattentive, of inspiriting the ignoble, and of reforming the profligate, and adding a fresh treasure to the store-house of wisdom, and another butwark to the citadel of virtue."—Los. Month. Rev., March, 1819, 307–319,

"The impression made upon us by the perusal of Human Life is that of an agreeable melanchly. There are parts which excite deeper sensations; but the general tendency is of this delightful cast."—Los. Let. Gaz., 1819, 97–98.

"The poem itself is one of the most beautiful things in any language. It is human life from the cradle to the tomb, with; all its pleasures, aspirations, frials, and triumphs. . . . Never, either, were the varied scenes of English life more sweetly described.—Hower: Homes and Haunts, de.

in it and by it, in our opinion, his genius, if not his fame, reached the culminating point. . . Nothing can be happier than the rapid introductory sketch of the four epochs,—the birth, the coming of ago, the marriage, and the death of the proprietor of the old manor-house.—Elien, Rev., July, 1856.

Human Life was also very favourably reviewed in Blackw. Mag., iv. 553-558.

8. ITALY; A PORN: Part the First, 1822, 12mo, pp. 164. Anon. Phila., 1823, 12mo.

"The name of the author of Italy is carefully guarded; but we think there can be little hesitation in ascribing it to Southey.

The excellence so far outweighs the defects, that we must commend Italy as one of the sweetest and most pleasing little volumes published for a long period."—Lon. Lit. Gaz., 18.22, 33-84. See, also, 55.

Not so favourably noticed in Lon. Month. Rev., Aug. 1822, 438-442. 3d edit. of Part the First, Lon., 1823, 12mo. Italy; a Poem: Part the Second, 1828, 12mo, pp. 188.

The critic of the Literary Gazette (1828, 353-354) does not think that he should have mistaken the Second Part, if he did the First Part, of Italy for Southey's: he considers the continuation "inferior in power and interest" to the commencement. The Monthly Reviewer (1828, 398-400) has about as little to say in favour of the Second Part as he ventured respecting the First Part.

Parts First and Second, with alterations, illustrated with 56 engravings after Turner, Stothard, &c., were pub. together in 1539, 8vo. 1. p., 4to, some imp. 4to; again, 1831, 8vo. again, 1835, 8vo; and in 1836, (the poem was not arished until 1831,) 8vo, 1. p., 4to, appeared the complete edition, with 56 engravings after Stothard, Provt, and Turner, engraved under the eye of the author et an expense to him of £10,000. This splendid volume was repub. in 1838, 4to, proofs, 42n.; 1842, cc. &vo. 16n.; 1859, 8vo. 16n. (See Dr. Wynno's Privace Libraries of New York, 1860, 57; Burton's Book-Hunter, etc., N. To return to Italy:

To return to Italy:

"It is indeed a delightful poem," remarks one of the most recent and one of the most intelligent of travellers in the classical land which Rogers has so well depicted; "a work of such perfect art that the art is nowhere seen; with just the right amount of personal feeling; with a warm seess of all that is attractive to a poet and a scholar in Italy, a generous judgment of all that is distrateful to an Englishman and a Protestant, and full of charming pictures which seem to demand those exquisite illustrations of Stothard and Turner with which they are so inseparably united in our minds. All his sketches of Venice are admirable,—bringing back the wonders of that unique city as freshly as the scenery of a last night's play."—HILLARD:

always upheld Flaxman, Stothard, and Turner, when they were little appreciated by their countrymen. The proof of his superior judgment is to be found in the fact that there was nothing in his house which was not valuable. In most other collections, however fue, I have always seen something that betrayed a want of taste,—an indifferent picture, a copy passing for an original, or something vulgar in the way of enament."—Ch. xi.

It was in the last days of the poet's life (June 12, 1855) that a presentation copy of the illustrated "Italy" on the table at Sunnyside led Washington Irving and the author of the present work to some reflections on the lengthened span of one to whom it was permitted for more than the ordinary term of human existence to test the promises of hope and the "Pleasures of Memory."

Romaine, Robert Dexter.

The New Age of

Gold; or, The Life and Adventures of, written by himself, Bost., 1856, 12mo.

Romaine, William, 1714-1795, a native of Hartlepool, Durham; educated at Hertford College and Christ pool, Durham; educated at Herting Congo and Church, Oxford; ordained deacon, 1736, and priest, 1738; became Curate of Loe Trenchard, Devon, 1737, and of Banstead and Horton, Middlesex, 1738; attacked Warburton's Divine Legation of Moscs in two sermons (The Nillian Lametina of Moscs Demonstrated, and Future Divine Legation of Moses Demonstrated, and Future Rewards and Punishments proved to be the Sanctions of the Mosaic Dispensation) preached before the University of Oxford, 1739, whereby he became engaged in an epistolary controversy with that puguacious and able scribe; from 1739 to 1747 was engaged in the prepara-tion of a new edition of Calasio's Concordanties Bibliorum Hebraicorum et Latinorum, which he pub., Londini, 1747 et seq., 4 vols. fol., (properly the 5th edit. of Rabbi Nathan's Meir Nethib, 1st ed., Venet., 1523, fol.:) a useful work, but injured by Romaine's Hutchinsonian infusions and disfigured by many inacouracies, (see Wadding, Luke, No. 1;) Lecturer of St. George's, Botolph Lane, and St. Botolph's, Billingsgate, 1748; Lecturer of St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, 1749 until his death; Assistant Morning Preacher at St. George's, Hanover Square, 1750-55; Professor of Astronomy in Gresham College, an office which he retained for only a short time, about 1752; married Miss Price, Feb. 1755; Curate and Morning Preacher at St. Olave's, Southwark, 1756-59; was refused the use of the University of Oxford pulpit after his sermon entitled "The Lord our Righteonsness," preached in that place in 1757,—about which time he declined a call to St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Philadelphia: Morning Preacher at St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, 1759; chosen Rector of St. Andrew Wardrobe and St. Ann's, Blackfriar's, 1764,—an election which was disputed, but by the Court of Chancery confirmed in 1766. In the duties of this office he remained zealously cuployed until the day of his death, July 26th, 1796. The solemnities of the "inevitable hour" were cheered by a confident expectation of that blissful immortality, which, during the many years of his zealous and laborious ministry and holy and beneficent life, he had coased rious ministry and holy and beneficent life, he had ceased not to teach and preach to his people as the great object of earthly probation.

"In his last filmes," observes Mr. Simpson, "not one feefful or muniming word ever escaped his lips. 'I have,' said he, 'the peace of God in my heart. I knew before the doctrines I preached to be truths, but now I experience them to be blessings. Jesus is more precious than rabbes; and all that can be desired on earth is more to reconst than rabbes; and all that can be desired on earth is more precious than rabbes; and all that can be desired on earth is mental powers to the last moment, and near his dissolution cried out, 'Holy, holy, holy, hold died Almighty! Glory be to thee on high for such peace on earth and good will to men!"

"Romaine's Works are in a very practical and experimental strain. There is in them great sameness as to thought and expression, which nevertheless becomes interesting by the real importance of the subject, and by proceeding from a unian mach impressed with it; they are plain truths, uttered from deep experience, by "presented by the hands of faith and love," williams's G. P., oth ed., 319.

"Romaine was a zealoue Hutchinsonian, and this peculiarity of sentiment is discernible, more or less, in all his writings. His works, however, are full of picty and unction."—Lownde's Brit. Lib., 365. See, also, 760.

"Romaine, who died in 1795, was one of the earliest of those writers to whom we owe that revival of religion in our own country, of which we have been speaking. He had considerable learning, as well as remarkably clear evangelical views. . . . He was strongly attached to the Established Church,"—Bickerstells C. S., 4th ed., 320.

"Although usually reproached with being a Methodist, . . . he was one of the most zealous advocates for the Church of England that has appeared in modern times."—Chalmers's Biog. Dict., xxvi. 391.

Sir Samuel Romilly the Orator.

"As Saturday drew near, my anxiety for Romilly's first public appearance had swallowed up every other concern... Romilly's success was as great as his friends predicted. He spoke for three hours and a half, and his speech might be named as the model of the simple style.... The fact is, he kept every one theined to attention, and made the whole case [impleadment of Lord Melvill] distinct to the dullest."—Fances Horake, May, 1805; Messedre and Corresp. of F. Horner.

"Sir Samuel Romilly was a very effective speaker on the topics which he handited; he was a most acute reasoner—of extraredinary pehetration and subtlety, with occasional appeals to SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY THE ORATOR.

June, 1825, org. "His eloquence, never tame and subdued, was seldom fervid and impetuous; but it was sufficient at all times to give impressive atterance to the indignant and tortured feelings of a patriot who mourned the corruption of his age;"—Lon. Month. Men., 2011, 1860, 2 who mourned the corruption of his age,"—Los. Month. Eco. Sept. 1820, 2.

From the tendernoss of his feelings, and from an anger never roused but by crue-ity and baseness, as much as from his genius and his pure taste, sprung that original and characteristic eloquence which was the hope of the afflicted as well as the terror of the oppressor. If his oratory had not flowed so largely from this moral source, which years do not dry up, he would not perhaps have been the only example of an orator who, after the age of sixty, daily increased in polish, in vigour, and in splendour."—Sir J. Roper, Margaret, d. 1514, the eldest daughter of Sir Thomas More, p. 1361, supra, and the wife of William Roper, (infra,) wrote two Declamations in English, which her father and she turned into Latin; composed an elo-quent defence of the rich man whom Quintilian accuses of poisoning the poor man's bees; and drew up a treat-ise on the Four Last Things, which her father preferred to one of his own on the same subjects. Erasmus and Cardinal Pole were among the admirers of her learning. She has been credited with a translation by her daughter: see Roper, Many.

Roper, Mary, daughter of the preceding, and one of the Gentlewomen of Queen Mary's Privy Chamber, and, like her mother, famous for her learning, translated into English part of Sir Thomas More's Exposition of the Passion of our Saviour, and the Ecclesiastical History of Euschius from Greek into Latin. We presume the Fassion of the Savior, kan the Ecclesisations Instery of Eusebius from Greek into Latin. We presume that the latter would have been published had it not been for the appearance of Bishop John Christopher's version, (p. 381, supra.) Roscoe, William, March 8, 1753-June 30, 1831, a native of Liverpool, where his father kept a public house and cultivated a market-garden, was at the age of six years placed under the tuition of a Mr. Martin, whose intelligent preceptorship was effectually seconded by that home-influence which, in almost all cases, is so potent for weal or wee: for weal or woe:

"To his care," says Roscoe, "and the instruction of a kind and affectionate mother, I believe I may safely attribute any good principles which may have appeared in my conduct during my future life. It is to her I owe the inculcation of those sentiments of humanity which became a principle in my mind. Nor did she neglect to supply me with such books as she thought would contribute to my literary improvement."

After some experience as a salesman of vegetables, the produce of his father's soil, in the Liverpool market, and a month's probation as a bookseller's apprentice, he was in 1769 articled for six years to an attorney and solicitor, devoting his spare hours to the perusal of Shenstone, Goldsmith, and others of the English classics; and to the knowledge of these he subsequently added an acquaintance with choice writers in the Greek, Latin, Spanish, Italian, and French languages. In 1773 he united with some other gentlemen in founding a society in Liverpool for the encouragement of the arts of painting and design, and he celebrated the occasion by an ode, which, after a separate publication at the time, was included in the same volume with a longer poem descrip-tive of an eminence overlooking his native town. (See

No. 1, infra.)

His clerkship completed, in 1774 he was admitted an attorney of the Court of King's Bench; in 1781 he was married to Miss Jane Griffles; and in 1796, after twenty years' practice, he relinquished his profession, and retired to literar case at Allerton Hall, (see Romos, William Stanley, infra,) a beautiful old manor, about six miles from Liverpool. And here it would have been his wisdom to have remained for the rest of his days, un-trammelled with business, and no further occupied with external affairs than might have been necessary for the discharge of those philanthropic duties which no man can safely neglect, and which ever bore a prominent place in Roscoe's regard. But it was not so written: carcely a twelvemonth had elapsed before he again became entangled in the things of this life. The skill displayed in the arrangement of the embarrassed affairs of the banking-house of his friends, the Clarkes, at Liverpool, was the introduction to an active partnership in that unfortunate establishment; and the end was ruin. But we anticipate. In 1806 he was returned to Parliament for Liverpool, and laboured zealously and effectually in his place for the preservation of national peace, the abolition of the slave-trade, and Catholic emancination. His private correspondence best illustrates the active interest which he telt in the promotion of the welfare of society, and his recognition of the duty incumbent upon the educated and influential classes to labour for the welfare of those less favourably circumstanced. From 1812 to 1815 he varied his literary pursuits with philanthropic enterprises of this character; and not the least interesting of these were his discussions with Mr. Robert Owen, of Lanark, as to the best means of benefiting such as were disposed to profit by the aid and counsels of their advisers and adjutors. Towards the close of the latter year he was sternly called from these benevolent interpositions for others by the increasing difficulties of the banking-house in which he was interested,-difficulties which resulted in a suspension of payments on the 25th of January, 1816. Mr. Roscoo still hoped, by careful and judicious management, to retrieve the credit of his house; but his labours were in vain: disaster followed disaster, loss crowded upon loss, and the rain was complete. But why linger on the painful record? He could not "command success;" but he did better: he showed that he "deserved it." He was found not unequal to the "uses of adversity." Not only was his property freely surrendered, but—here we shall do well to horrow the eloquent words of one of America's most eloquent writers:

"In view of such a state of things, he determined upon a sacrifice that can be duly estimated only by him who understands that follow-feeling for the master-minds of our race, and the forms in which they have become samiliar, which springs up and grows strong in the boson where it is habitually cherished; by him who knows in its full measure the happiness of collecting about him the gens of literature and art, connecting them with associations of feeling and corcumstance, gazing upon them as upon the face of friends, and into them as the oracles of truth; by him, in a word, the idea of whose usefulness, honour, and daily enjoyment is associated indissolubly in his own mind with books and products of art, not in their general aspect, but as they have been gathered by the slow accumulation of careful expenditure, and become endeared by years of blessed and ministering companiouship in his own cheerful study."—Tuckerman's Characteristics of Literature, (First Series, 1819:) The Philanthropist: William Roscoe. Also in N. Amer. Rev., xii. 94-109.

But who that remembers the Sketch Book will forgive us if we fail to quote at least a few of those words of beauty and of power in which Washington Irving has embalmed the memory of William Roscoe?

embalmed the memory of William Roscoe?

"I was told of his being unfortunate in business. I could not pity him, as I heard some rich men do. I considered him far above the reach of my pity. Those who live only for the world, and in the wurld, may be cast down by the frowns of adversity; but a man like Roscoe is not to be overcome by the mutations of fortune. They do but drive him in upon the resources of his own mind, to the superior society of his own thoughts, which the best of men are apt sometimes to neglect and to roam abroad in search of less worthy associates. He is independent of the world around him. He lives with antiquity and with posterity; with antiquity, in the awest communion of studious retirement, and with posterity; in the generous applyings after future renown. The sollisade of such a mind is its state of highest enjoyment. It is then visited by those elevated meditations which are the proper aliment of noble souls, and are like manua sent from heaven in the wilderness of this world."—From the original, as copied by Jordan into the London Literary Gazette, Oct. 2, 1819, 635; see The Sketch Book.

This is a melancholy subject, to be sure; yet, as a bibliographer, we must not omit to call the attention of the collector to the Catalugue of the very Select and Valua-ble Library of William Roscoe, sold by Auction, Liverpool, 1816, 8vo. This catalogue was drawn up by his own hand. The Books were sold for £5150, the Prints for £1880, the Drawings for £738. For the fine portrait of Leo X., Mr. Coke of Holkham gave 500 guineas. See Dibdin's Dibliographical Decameron; Lon. Gent. Mag., Nov. 1816, 458. See, also, Roscoe's Library; or, Old Books and Old Times, by the Rev. James Aspinall, Liverp., 1853, p. 8vo, with a head.

Mr. Roscoe survived his misfortunes more than sixteen

"And now the cares of active life were wellnigh ended, the partner of his days had gone before to her rost, and his feet were treading the declivity of life. He had put the finishing touch to an edition of Pope's works, [see Pore, Alexander, supra,] and the Holkham Catalogue [in MS, of Mr. Coke's library] was completed; what remained, then, for one who had so well sustained the burden and heat of the day, but that he should dedicate its close to recreative employment and repose? With his dimunished resources increased by the grateful contributions of friendship, he accordingly released himself from all bustling or laborious employments, and passed into retirement. . . The perception of physical beauty, the intelligent love of nature, the philanthropic spirit, the literary taste, which were the day-stars of his youth, continued their ministry in age, and the holier presence of domestic sympathies, of well-founded friendships, of blessed remembrances, was blending its cheerful influence with the deeper and more inspiring spirit of religion."—Tuckerman's Characteristics, ut supra. In 1824 he was elected (the sixth Englishman who in the course of 273 years had been so honoured) a member of La Socio dell' Academia della Crusca.

We quote a few hues on each side:

"I am perhaps not so great a friend to Lorenzo as you; perhaps I may think, on so some other points more clopely connected with my pursuits, somewhat differently from you; but, take the with my pursuits, somewhat differently from you; but, take the whole together, there is no writer with whom, on all the various topics he treats, I coincide more heartly than with you. You have shown, from line own wither, adulities, and heroic spirit, why Lorenzo deserved to have Mr. Roscoe for his historian. . . The work was eastigated with an unsparing hand by Malcolm Laing in the Edinburgh Review for January, 1806, 336-358, (the critic is especially indignant at the historian's defence of Lucretia Borgia,) but received much kinder treatment from Robert Southey in the An-

The Quarterly reviewer, who had little to say for the Life of Lorenzo, finds even less to praise in Leo X.:

"The second great attempt of our author on Italian history proved by no means equally successful. Its faults were greater, its virtues less; and, by a singular infelicity, though it discovered few tokens of spirit or genius, it could still less lay claim to the praise of correct composition. . Yet the positive delinquencies which deformed the history of Leo the Tenth were protected from observation by the negative fault of dullness. It was screened by clouds of its own raising; and the literary character of Mr. Roscoe still continues to be estimated by his first and best performance, excepting indeed so far as another and more best performance, excepting indeed so far as another and more popular test has been furnished by his verses, some of which possess considerable merit."—Lon. Quar. Rev., June, 1812, 265.

We quote the following animadversion, - instar omnium, with the suggestion that it is only fair to examine how -instar omnium, far the historian has been enabled to fortify his original positions, and to what extent he has been endorsed by other authors:

"It is much to be regretted that Roscoe in his Life of Lorenzo de Medici and his History of the Pontificate of Leo X. seems to have studiously glossed over the implety and licentiousness of the most distinguished of those periods and rather cudeavoured to render them attractive, than to excite that abhorrence and disgust which a faithful delineation of their principles and practice could hardly fail to produce."—Bishor Van Milder.

Our last quotation shall be from a countryman of our own, who to his many scholarly acquisitions added an intimate acquaintance with the literature and history of

"In the present age of intellectual activity, attention is so generally bestowed on all modern languages which are ennobled by a literature, that it is not singular an acquaintance with the Italian in particular should be widely diffused. Great praise, however, is due to the labours of Mr. Roscoe. There can be little doubt that his elaborate biographies of the Madici, which contain as md. Hierary criticism as historical marrative, have mainly contributed to the promotion of these studies among his squitrymen. These works have of late met with much flippant criticism in some of their leading journals. In Italy they have been translated, are now cited as authorities, and have received the most encominatic notices from several eminent scholars. These facts afford conclusive testimony of their merits,"—WM. TI. PRESCOTT, the historiau: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1824, 340; and in his Miscellanies, ed. 1855, 412. Only a few copies were printed, (by subscription:) the stones were destroyed, and copies are very rare. The author pub. a paper on Monandrian Plants in Trans. Linn. Soc., 1806; another on the Ar-rangement of Plants, in same, 1810; and another on Dr. rangement of Plants, in same, 1810; and another on Dr. William Boxburgh's (q. c.) Description of the Monandrous Plants of India, in same, 1814. He also wrote the preface to Daulby's Catalogue of the Etchings of Rembrandt, (see DAULBY, DANIEL;) contributed the de-Rembrands, (see DAULBY, DANIEL;) contributed the de-scriptions to the Italian views in Prouts Landscape Annual, and A Tribute to the Memory of Richard Rey-nolds, (q. c.,) pub. in Verses to the Memory of Richard Reynolds, N. York, 1817, 4to. Nor must we omit to mention that there has been recently pub. a small vol-ume entitled (26) The Poetical Works of William Roscoe,

First Collected Edition, Lon., 1857, sq. 16mo, pp. 104. It is as a poet that, as we have seen on a preceding page, the Quarterly Reviewer (vol. vii. 266) is disposed to make the largest concessions to the admirers of Mr. Roscoe. On the same theme a highly respectable critic

"The poetical talents of Roscoe have been praised by no mean judges. His verses are very fair specimens of that kind of poetry the excellence of which consists less in strength of wing pootry the excellence of which consists less in strength of wing then in beauty of plume and lightness of movement. His song is flowing and harmonious rather than energetic."—ALLAN CUNNINGLAN CONSINGUAL Blut see Roscow, WILLIAM STANLEY, (quotation from Lon. Athen., April 7, 1860, 471.)

Of his pross style, the same critic observes,

of his principal fault is want of original force of thought; he never surprises us with ideas either high or profound; his eye sees but a little way, and loves the ground; he is ever equal, ever tranquil, and neither rises nor falls. He discusses the merits of a medal in the same quiet, gentle way that he discusses to the awakening energies of the Reformation. . . In short, his style is more remarkable for weakness than force,—for being 'Florentine and slender,' rather than weighty and colossal,"—Bold.

A distinguished foreign commentator on English historians, whilst admitting great morits in, has much fault to find with, the narration of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; but he concludes with a query not very flattering to the biographer of Lorenzo and Leo:

"With all the abundance of his Italian elegance, what is the overloaded and affected Roscoe when compared with Gibbon?"—FRED. VON SCHLEGEL Lects. on the Hist. of Lit., Lect. XIV., English trans.

Speaking of the style of Burnet's Own Times, Charles Lamb remarks.

"None of Mr. Roscoe's sage remarks, all so apposite, and coming in so clever, lost the reader should have had the trouble of drawing an inference."—Lamb's Letters.

Other notices of Roscoe and his works, in addition to the many already cited, will be found in Cunninghan's Biog. Hist, of Eng., viii. 394-404; Encyc. Brit., 8th cd., xix. 472, (by T. S. Traill, M.D.;) Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XI.; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 849, and his Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 222, 514; European Mag., July, 1822, (with a portrait;) Lon. Gent. Mag., 1832, ii. 179, (Obitary,) 315, 316; Lamb's Works; T. Moore's Memoirs, iv. 242, 248, 322. The passages last cited, it will be noticed, refer to Roscoe's editions of the Works of Alexander Pope and the controversy thence resulting. These topics have been already treated on, and perhaps at a length quite sufficient to satisfy the reader, in our Life of the Burd of Twickenham, (Pope, Alexander, supra.) See, also. Bowles, Rev. William Lisle; Vaux, Roberts, Nos. 6, 7. It will be observed that three of Mr. Roscoe's sons,—Henry, Thomas, and William Stanley,—one of his grandsons, William Caldwell, one of his grandsons' wives, Mrs. Henry Roscoe, and one of his granddaughters, Mrs. Henry Roscoe Sandbach, have a place among the authors of this Dictionary.

Roscoe, William Caldwell, b. 1823, and a duate of the London University, was a son of William Stanley Roscoe, (infra,) and a grandson of William Roscoe the historian, (supra.) Poems and Essays by the late William Caldwell Roscoo, edited, with a Prefatory Memoir, by his Brother-in-Law, Richard Rolt Hutton, Lon., 1860, 2 vols. p. 8vo, pp. 1020. Vol. i. contains Eliduke, Count of Yveloc, and another tragedy, sonnets, and poems; vol. ii. consists wholly of essays originally pub. in the Nat. Rev. (edited by R. H. Hutton, the biographe.) and other periodicals. Notices of these vols.

Rose, Rt. Hon. George, M.P., 1744-1818, a native of Brechin, shire of Angus, Scotland, was first a surgeon's apprentice, then a purser in the navy, and afterwards Keeper of the Records. After superintending the publication of Doomsday Book, he was in 1767 appointed to complete the Journals of the House of Lords, in 31 vols. folio, for which he was handsomely paid. He was Clerk of the Parliaments, and for half a century, with the exception of two short intervals, "a sort of ministerial fixture, carrying on the routine of public offices, with many useful plans and objects of a subordinate nature." On the accession of the Addington administration, in 1801, and afterwards on the formation of that of the "Talents," in 1806, he retired with Mr. Pitt, but resumed the public service in both cases on the restoration of the Tories; became Vice-President, and soon afterwards President, of the Board of Trade, (which office he held at the time of his death,) and Treasurer of the Navy. 1. Ross, Sir James Clarke, Knt., Captain R.N., D.C.L., son of George Ross, Esq., and nephew of the late
Sir Juhn Ross. (infra.) was b. in London, April 15, 1800; in 1812 entered the Royal Navy on board the Brisole, $ commanded by his uncle; continued to serve under him in other ships, and accompanied him on his first Northwest Expedition, 1818; from Jan. 1819 to Oct. 1825 was engaged under Capt. Parry in his three voyages in search of a Northwest passage, and in 1827 again accompanied Parry in his attempt to reach the North Pole; from 1829 to 1833 served under his uncle in his Second Northwest Expedition, and had the honour of discovering the true position of the North Magnetic Pole, (see Lon. Quar. Rev., July, 1835, 3, by Sir J. Barrow; N. Amer. Rev., April, 1855, 317, by Augustus Woodbury; T. Moore's Memoirs, vii. 6; Ross, Sir John, Kat., No. 4;) in 1835 carried rollef to a number of ice bound whalers in Baffin's Bay, and was subsequently, until 1838, employed by the Admiralty in making a magnetic survey of Great Britain and Ireland; from Sept. 30, 1839, to Sept. 4, 1843, commanded an expedition, (ships Erebus and Terror,) chiefly for magnetic investigation, to the Antarctic Seas, and made three attempts to reach the South Pole, (see A Voyage. &c., infra:) Jan. 31, 1848, was appointed to the ? Enterprise, and made an unsuccessful voyage to Baffin's Bay in search of Sir John Franklin: see Franklin, Sir John; KANE, ELISHA KENT, M.D., and notices of other Northwest Expeditions, in this Dictionary. In A Narrative of the Discovery of the Fate of Sir John Franklin, &c., by Capt. McClintock, 1859, and in Arctic Regions, by P. L. Simmonds, new ed., 1859, 12mo, the reader will find much to interest him. The contributions to scientifia knowledge of this eminent explorer (who is versed'in astronomy, magnetism, meteorology, zoology, bothuy, and other sciences) have been warmly acknowledged and partially, at least, rewarded; he was made Lieu-tenant, Dec. 26, 1822, Commander, Nov. 8, 1827, Post Captain, Oct. 28, 1834, Knight, and D.C.L. Oxon., 1844. He has also been elected a Fellow of the Linnman Society, (1823.) of the Royal Society, (1828.) of the Royal Astronomical Society and the Royal Geographical Society, and is a corresponding member of several foreign learned associations. In 1833 he received the thanks of the Common Council of the City of London, and a piece of plate from the Land Arctic Expedition; in 1841 was presented with the Founder's Gold Medal of the London Geographical Society; in 1842 with the Gold Medal of the Geographical Society of Paris; and in 1843 (we reckon this among his rewards) with the hand of the lady who since 1844 has been known as Lady Ross. As an author, Routh, Martin Joseph, D.D., Sopt. 15, 1755—Dec. 22, 1854, a native of South Elmham, near Beccles, Suffolk, where his father, Rev. Peter Routh, was Rector, matriculated as a battler at Queen's College, Oxford, May 31, 1770, and in July, 1771, was elected a demy of St. Mary Magdalene College; became a Follow in July, 1776, and M.A. on the 23d of October following; College Librarian, 1781; Senior Proctor, 1783; Junior Dean of Arts, 1784 and 1785; B.D., July 15, 1786; College Bursah, 1791; President of Magdalene College, April 11, 1791, until his death, in his 100th year. He had admitted to Magdalene College 183 Fellows, 234 demies, and 162 choristers. When he was nearly one hundred, some one remarked to him, "That is a pretty good age." "Yes," replied the Doctor, "but there was a Dissenting minister who died at 107; and," continued the old gentleman, "I should like the Church to win." In 1810 he became Rector of Tylcharst, near Reading, and to this retreat he retired for rest at certain seasons of the year. His publications, few in number, were distinguished by profound scholarship and great critical soumen. 1. Platonis Enthydemas et Gorgias, Gr. et Lat. recensuit, vertit, Notasque adjecit.

He was the author of a work which, after lying more than 200 the author of a work which, after lying more than 200 years in MS., has been recently twice privately printed, viz.: 1. History of the Kirk of Scotland, with Additions and Illustrations by his Sons: Pt. 1, 1558-1637; Pt. 2, [see Row, Jonn, infra,] 1637-1639, Edin., Maitland Club, (No. LV.,) 1842, 2 vols. 4to. Row, John, second son of the preceding, was for many years Rector of the Perth Grammar School; in 1631 became one of the ministers of Aberdeen; in 1644 was chosen Moderator of the Provincial Assembly at Aberdeen; in 1652, by Parliamentary influence, became Principal of King's College, Aberdeeu, but fell into disgrace at the Restoration, and resigned this office in 1661. He was subsequently a schoolmaster in Aberdeen, but spent his last years in retirement in the parish of Kin-ellar, about eight miles from Aberdeen. See Memorials of the Family of Row, and Chambers's and Thomson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, ed. 1855, iv. 203-205. He was noted-end the same may be said of his father and grandfather-for an intimate acquaintance with the Hebrew language; and Nos. 1 and 2, infra, were among the first manuals of the kind in Scotland. 1. Hebraicae Linguae Institutiones, Glasg., 1634, 12mo; 2d ed., combined with—2. Xibias Hebraica seu Vocabularium continens pracipuas Radices Linguas Hebrase, etc., 1644, 12mo. 3. Exaputita Baciling et Carolum II., etc., Carmen, Abredon., 1660, 4to. Gordonstoun sale, 1976, £2 18s. In this "Carmen" he strove to make his court to the king, styling his Majesty's predecessor "Trux vilias vermes," being the anagram of "Oh vile cruel worm" (Oliver Cromwell) Latinized. But the laudation and abuse were equally vain: he had the mortification of seeing his written censures of the royal family dragged from their recesses in the college and burnt at the cross of Aberdeen by the hands of the hangman. As we have already seen, (Row, John, supra,) he wrote a Supplement (August, 1637-July, 1639) to his father's History of the Kirk of Patland.

Rowe, Elizabeth, 1674-1737, the daughter of Walter Singer, a Dissenting minister of Ilchester, Somersutshire, where Elizabeth was born, was noted at an early age for her beauty and accomplishments, and could have hoasted—if boasting had been her foible—of having Bishop Ken and Dr. Watts for her advisers, the Hon. Mr. Thynne for her tutor, and Matthew Prior for her suitor. She was wise enough to consult her heart in the disposition of her hand, and at the age of thirty-six married Mr. Thomas Rowe, a gentleman ten to thirteen years her junior. Their union—a very happy one it proved—was severed by the death of Mr. Rowe in 1715, aged 28 years. After this sad event she left London, and spent years. After this said event one and advantage the rest of her life—remaining a widow to the last—at Frome, where she possessed a handsome estate, from which she freely distributed to those less favoured. She began to write verses at twolve years of age, produced her paraphrase of the thirty-eighth chapter of Job (it was suggested to her by the excellent Bishop Ken) before she was nineteen, and cultivated literature more or less during the leisure hours of her life. the editor of Bendine's and Dalison's Reports, was a native of Little Barford, Redfordebire; received his education at Westminster School, under Dr. Busby; at sixteen was entered a student of the Middle Temple; at the age of ninctoen was left his own master by the death of his father, and henceforth paid much attention to pootry and but little to law; from 1708 to 1711 was Under-Secretary of State, being subordinate to the Duke of Queensberry, who was Secretary; on the accession of theorge I. (1714) was made Poet-Laurente, became one of the Land-Surveyors of the Customs of the Port of London, Clerk of the Prince of Wales's Council, and, by appointment of Lord-Chancellor Parker, Clerk of the resentations. "It is a remarkable instance of the decay of dramatic art at this period, that see real of the principal authors of the time felt themselves at liberty to write initations of old plays belonging to the original school, by way of adapting them to the tasts of their own ago. The First Protent of Rowe is well known as a poor initation of Massinger's Futal Invery: it does not greatly excel the original in the management and conduct of the piece; and in every thing else falls as far beneath it as the baldest translation can sink below the most spirited original."—Six Walters Scorr: Exacy on the Drame, in Encyc. "The Fair Penilient is one of the most plensing tragedles on the stage, where it still keeps its turns of appearing, and proba-bly will long keep them, for there is securely any work of any post at once so interesting by the fable and so delightful by the language. The story is domestic, and therefore easily received by the imagination and assimilated to common life; the distion is exquisitely harmonious, and soft or sprightly as occasion

9. Jane Shore; a Tragedy, s. a., sed 1714, tto.

"Written, as the author professes, in sintlation of Shakespeare's syle. In what he thought himself an innuator of Shakespeare's syle. In what he thought himself an innuator of Shakespeare's is not easy to conceive. The numbers, the decion, the sentiments, and the conduct, every thing in which initiation can consist, are remote in the utmost degree from the manner of Shakespeare, whose dramas it resembles only as it is an English story and as some of the persons have their names in history. . . . I know not that there can be found in his plays any deep search into nature, any accurate discrimination of kindred qualities, or nice display of passion in its progress; all is general and undefined. Nor does he much interest or affect the auditor, except in 'Jace Shore,' who is always seen and heard with pity. Alcus is a character of empty noise with no resemblance to sorrow now to natural madness."—Da. Jourson: Life of Rose.

"It was mighty simple in Rowe to write a play now professedly in Shakespeare's style, that is, professedly in the style of a land age."—Pope, in Sprace's Ascodots, sect. iv.

"Perhaps you never any Mrs. Siddons act it; but, even read, it is most touching poetry; you must allow Jane Shore her lank among the heroines of the English stage. . . . Rowe's Jane Shore I maintain to be perfectly moral; he paints her only in her ponitence—in all the horors of remores—in abject poet ty: she is brought before you as the victim of her own guilt, and, if you will compare with Shakspere, I must say that Cloopatra is immoral, and Jane Shore is not."—Six James Mackitrosh: Professio of a Mino of the World: Lom. "Rowe did not possess boldness and vigour, but was not without sweetness and feeling; he could excite the softer emotions, and hence, in his Fur Praitent, Jane Store, and Lady Jane Gray, he has successfully chosen female heroines and their weaknesses for his subjects,"—Augustras William von Schlegel: Lects. on Dram. Rowe was twice married: and this will not surprise those who linger over the glowing enlogies on his face, person, and mind which his friend Dr. Welwood has transmitted to posterity. True, his friend Pope charges him with the want of that valuable article, a heart, and Addison admitted its existence only to testify to the lightness of its material, ("the levity of his heart is such,")—but the former acknowledged the charm of audi,)—but the former acknowledged the charm of qualities which, to say the least, go quite as far to win scooplanes and popularity in general society: "Mr. Rows accompanied me, and passed a week in the Forest. I need not tell you how much a man of his turn entertained me; but I must acquaint you there is a vivacity and gaisty of dis-1862

position, almost peculiar to him, which make it impossible to part from him without that uneasiness which generally succeeds all our pleasures."—Pops to Edward Blount, Feb. 10, 1716

This quotation will remind some of our readers of Pope's epitaph inscribed on Rowe's monument in Westminster Abbey: how much it was altered (we do not say improved) from the original will be seen by comparing the lines as they stand with the first draught in Pope's Works, and in Biog. Collier, 1840, p. 8vo, (Percy Soc.,) for an account of which see Brit. Bibliog., iv. 320-22, and Collier's Bibl. Acet. of Early Eng. Lit., 1865; and of five unprinted plays, viz.: 15. "He is generally classed only in the third rank of our dramatists. His Muse is evidently a plebolan nymph, and had not been educated in the school of the Graces. His most tolerable production is 'The New Wonder; or, A Woman never 'Vexed.' Its drafts of citizen life and manners have an air of reality and honest truth; the situation and characters are forcible, and the sentiments earnest and unaffected.'—Cumpbell's Specimens.

"Rowley appears to have excelled in describing a certain amuable quictness of disposition and disinterested love of merality, carried almost to a naradoxical excess, as in his 'Fair amusble quietness of disposition and disinterested love of morality, catricid almost to a paradoxical excess, as in his 'Fair Quarrel,' and in the comedy of 'A Woman never 'Vexed,' which is written in many parts with a pleasing simplicity and nativetà equal to the novelty of the conception."—Huskit's Lects. on the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. II.

"A Mutch at Midnight, and All's Lost by Lust, the former in the comic, and the latter in the tragic, department of his art, evince, in incident and humour, in character and in pathos, powers which repel the charge of medicerity. Upon the whole, however, we consider him as ranking last in the roil of worthlus who have thus far graced our pages."—Drake's Shakep. and his Times, 1, 570.

"Rowley and Le Torneur, especially the former, have occasionally good lines; but we cannot say that they were very superior dramatists. Rowley, however, was [not] often in conic partnorship with Massinger."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4tr ed., 1854, iii. 124.

"Have you seen Rudder's new 'History of Gloucestershire'?
His additions to Sir Robert Alkyns make it the most sensible history of a county that we have had yet; for his descriptions of the site, soil, products, and prospects of each parish are extremely good and picturesque; and he treats fancial prejudices and Saxon etymologies, when unfounded, and traditions, with due contempt."—Horace Walpole to Rev. Rumford, Sir Benjamin Thompson, Count of, b. March 26, 1753, at Woburn, Mass., d. August 20, 1811, at Auteuil, near Paris; after a short experience at store-keeping and school keeping, in 1772 married the widow of Colonel Rolfe and the daughter of Rev. Timothy Walker, of Rumford, (now Concord,) Mass; was with the American army at Lexington, but subsequently joined the Royalists, and became Licutenant-Colonel of a regiment of Dragoons; in 1784 was knighted by George III., and in 1791 created, by the Elector Palatine of Bavaria, a Count of the Holy Roman Empire; resided for several years at Munich, where he attained great distinction in every department of action—civil, military, political, and scientific—in which he exerted his great talents. In 1802 he married the widow of Lavoisier; but-as the lady's first husband would have said, and the second proved-where there are no affinities there can be no union, and the parties soon separated. Rush, Benjamin, M.D., Dec. 24, 1745-April 19, 1813, a descendant of John Rush, one of Cronwell's favourite captains, was born on his father's farm in Byborry township, near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1769, and pursued his medical studies under Dr. John Redman, of Philadelphia and the college of the state of the phia, from that date until 1766; subsequently attended lectures for two years at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M.D. in 1768, gaining great reputation by his Latin thesis, Dissertatio Physica de Coctione Ciberum in Ventricule, (pub. in Edin., 1768, 8ve.) continued his medical researches at London and Paris in the winter of 1768 and the summer of 1769, and in the latter year was elected Professor of Chemistry in the College of Philadelphia; transferred to the chair of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in 1789, and in 1791, the college having been clevated to the University of Pennsylvania, elected Professor of the Institutes and Practice of Medicine and of Clinical Practice,—to which in 1796 he added the pro-fessorship of the Practice of Physic,—retaining the three departments for the rest of his life.

Eminent as a physician, a student of general science, a scholar, and a philanthropist, Dr. Rush was equally distinguished as an active and enthusiastic advocate of the cause of American liberty: in 1776, as a representa-tive of Pennsylvania in the National Congress, he signed the Declaration of Independence; in April, 1777, having six months previously married the daughter of Richard Stockton, of New Jersey, who also signed the Declaration, he was appointed Surgeon-General, and in July the Physician-General, of the Military Hospitals for the Middle Department, and in that capacity attended his wounded compatriots at the battles of Princeton and Brandywine; in 1787 he was a member of the Convention of Pennsylvania for the Adoption of the Federal Constitution; and from 1799 until his death was Trans. I surer of the United States Mint.

But the arduous duties of his responsible professor-ships,—it was computed that no less than two thousand .F691 two hundred and fifty pupils in all profited by his public ; instructions,—the care of many private students, the wearlsome details of an extensive practice, and patriotic labours for the conservation of those political liberties which he had so materially aided to secure, were not found so absorbing as to preclude frequent and most valuable contributions to the Republic of Letters during a period of forty-nine years,—from the 19th to the 68th year of his life. Of the topics treated of in his many pamphlets, (in which shape almost all of his principal productions originally appeared,) and his papers in the scientific and literary periodicals of the day, we have made the following alphabetical table, which exhibits at a glance his versatility, industry, and knowledge of the requisites of the "times and seasons" in which his days were cast.

A more rigid analysis, a stricter classification, would considerably expand this list; but the intelligent student will be satisfied with no analysis, classification, or résumé will be satisfied with no analysis, classification, or resume which could be offered, but must furnish himself with the following seven octavo volumes, into which Dr. Rush collected those occasional writings which he thought most likely to prove of permanent service to his race.

Russ, John T., M.D.; Sanders, Jases, M.D., No. I. It would be easy to quote—the difficulty is to refrain from quoting—from the authorities just cited the warmest enlogies to the merits of this illustrious man.

est eurogies to the merits of this litustrious man.

"His name," remarks one of the most learned and distinguished men of modern times,—one, too, as we have just seen, of Rush's biographers, "was familiar to the medical world as the Sydenham of America. His accurate observations and correct discrimination of epidemic diseases well cuttled him to this distinction; while in the original energy of his reasoning he far excelled his prototype."—Dr. Thomas Young: whi supra.

His add denning against a humanity indeed attention.

His self-denying services to humanity indeed attracted the attention and elicited the commendation, not of the "medical world" only, but of all classes and orders of The King of Prussia in 1805, the Queen of Etruria in 1807, the Emperor of Russia in 1811, sent costly offerings to him who had the courage and the faith to "stand between the living and the dead" til "the plague was stayed." The illustrious Zinmermann, when he heard of Rush's services during the fever of 1793, for once forgot his praises of "Solitude" in admiration of the philanthropy which sought this grim companionship with the King of Terrors and his ghostly victims, and declared

"Sa conduite a mérité que non-sculement la ville de Phila-delphie, mals l'humanité entière lui élève une statue."

Equally at home among the rich and the poor, (we quote a few lines from a tribute to his character published by us in the North American Review for October, 1860,] now administering consolation at the bedside of the departing, and anon one of the most resolute in the imposing convocation which decreed the Magna Charta of American liberty, his life was full of bonour, and his death was peace. When at last his career of usofulness was suddenly arrested, it was felt that his country, and especially the city long honoured by his well-carned fame, had sustained no common loss. All ranks and conditions lamented his death : but no tribute would have been so grateful to the departed spirit, had it been allowed to linger a while amidst familiar scenes, as the tears of the poor and the wretched, who, rendered bold by the agony of a great grief, filled the house of mourning with their lamenfations,- imploring permission once more to gaze upon the face, or at least to touch the coffin, of the benefactor whom they should see no more on carth. But why prolong "human culogies" upon those whom we o "applauded by angels and numbered with the believ just"?

In a second codicil, dated 12th April, 1869, he gives the following directions regarding his publications:
"I have given the copyrights of all my works to the library Con puny, and I will and direct that they shall, for the next halt-century, publish every ten years (and earlier and oftener, if called for) an edition of five hundred copies of any or of all of them, so that they shall always have on hand a number sufficient to satisfy any demand which may be made for any or either of them, at a price not exceeding the cost of publication. I leave additions and corrections in the printer's copies, preparatory to a subsequent edition, which I imperatively require to be published exactly as they are left. The original parts of them have been written without assistance, and I wish to be alone responsible for all the faults of thought, division, definition, and style, and of my corrected orthography, as I consider it. An editor sometimes joins himself to a work by a supposed emendation of it. Let him, in a work of his own, justly blame what he editor sometimes joins himself to a work by a supposed emenda-tion of it. Let him, in a work of his own, justly blame what he pleases in mine, but not attempt to suit it to any future times and manners. Every writing should have its own times and manners. Let him prevent, not imagine, typographical errors; let him strive to improve my spelling only where the world cor-rects its own redundances and comparisons on that point. In our important faults it is bad morality, even in science and literature, to try to escape the charge of errors by turning them over to others for correction."

Rushworth, John., 1607 7-1600, a native of Northumberland, educated at Oxford, and subsequently a member of Lincoln's Inn, played a distinguished part on the ber of Lincoln's Inn, played a distinguished part on the Parliamentary side; was reveral times an M.P.; acted as assistant clerk to Henry Elsyngue, and was secretary to Sir T. Fairfax and Sir O. Bridgman. He neglected his the remarkable transactions of his time, and was contequently thrown into King's Bench Prison for debt in 1684, and there died in 1690. As an author, Rushworth comprising Incidents, Official and Personal, from 1819 to 1684, and there died in 1690. As an author, Rushworth 1825: including Negriations on the Oregon Question is known in his Historical Collections, pub. 1659-1701,

7 vols. fol., and The Tryall of Thomas, Earl of Strafford, 1680, fol.; again, 1700, fol., which is ranked as an 8th vol. of the Historical Collections.

The 7 vols. comprise four Parts, viz.: Pt. 1, 1618-29, vol. 1, 1659; (three edits, one of which is dated 1675, appeared in 1659, and a fourth edit. in 1682;) Pt. 2, 1628-9-40, vols. ii.. iii.. 1680: Pt. 2, 1640-44 3-9-40, vols. ii., jil., 1680; Pt. 3, 1640-44, vols. iv., v 1692; Pt. 4, 1645-48, vols. vi., vii., 1701. A new and hetter edit. of the whole, together with the Tryall of Strafford, was pub. in 1721, 8 vols. fol.; l. p., r. fol. The title runs as follows: Historical Collections of Private Matters of State, Weighty Matters in Law, Remarkable Proceedings in Five Parliaments, from 1618 to 1648; also the Tryall of Thomas, Earl of Strafford, upon an Imponchment of High Treason. Rushworth's intention (see Pref. to vol. ii.) was to bring down his register to the dissolu-tion of the Long Parliament in 1653. An abridgment of the original vols., entitled Historical Collections, Abridged and Improved, appeared in 1703, 6 vols. 8vo. There contain matter not in the first folio ed.; but the student must have the last folio ed., (1721, worth about £5,) and should add to it The Connexion between [Heywood] Townshend and Rushworth's Collections, 1681, 8vo.

Rushworth has been lauded as a truthful and impartial narrator by the enemies of Charles I., and denounced as a liar by the friends of that monarch and his measures. Nalson, we have seen, (Nalson, John, supra,) undertook to confute Rushworth; but his Impartial Collection, promised to extend to 1648, was cut short by his death, coming down no lower than Jan. 1641-2. Bishop Warburton found "vastly curious and valuable matter" in both Collections.

John Dunton (see his Post Angel, and Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1857, 675) declares of Rushworth's Fourth Part that "the reader must needs find it as much diverting and pleasurable as instructive and profitable;" but our modern Consor, Thomas Carlyle, rather disrespect-fully refers to the chronicler as "dusty old Rushworth." Rushworth also published from time to time, during the Civil War, a number of single Letters to the Parliament, and left MSS. which have never yet seen the light.

Ruskin, John, LL.D., b. in London, 1819, and educated as a gentleman commoner at Christ Church, Oxford, where, in 1839, he took the Newdegate Prize for English Poetry, was appointed Rode's Lecturer at Cambridge in 1867, and Slade Professor of Art in the University of Oxford, Aug. 1869. He has devoted himself for many years, in the various capitals of Europe, to the study of painting and architecture, and communicated to the pablic, from time to time, the results of his investigations, in a series of well-known volumes and brockers, which we proceed to enumerate. Mr. Ruskin's critics find so much to say both in praise and consure of his style, his spirit, and his canons of art, respectively, that a referonce to their verdicts will be the most equitable discharge of our judicial duties. Of some of these verdicts, however, we shall, in accordance with our custom, present hrief summaries to our readers.

At the conclusion of the Preface to vol. v., Mr. Ruskin, after explaining the causes of the delay in the completion of his series, (extending, it will be observed, from 1843 to 1860,) remarks,

"In the main aim and principle of the book there is no varia-tion from its first syllable to its last. It declares the perfectness and eternal beauty of the Work of God, and tests all work of man by concurrence with, or subjection to, that. And it differs from most books, and has a chance of being in some respects better for the difference, that it has not been written either for fame, or for money, or for conscience' sake, but of necessity."

It will be proper to add extracts from several critiques, the first written after the publication of volume iii., the second and third after the publication of volume iv., and the last recorded immediately after the issue of woth the last recorded immediately after the issue of volume v.:

"We have already bestowed on this volume more space than its merits deserve; but it gross and glaring extravagancies and defects constitute a strong claim to notice. It is the worst book of a bad series of books, muchievous to art, mischievous to literature, but mischlevous above all to those young and eager minds, animated by the love of art and of literature, which may mistake this declamatory trash for substantial or stimulating food. We are the less disposed to acquit Mr. Ruskin became he is not altogether without faculties which might have made him an useful and an elegant writer. His style, when it is not too inflated, is generally perspictions, and sometimes forcible; his perceptions are acute; he is not devoid of industry, or even of tasts. But all these qualities are perverted and destroyed by the entire absence of masculine judgment, by the failure of the logical faculty, and by a strong propensity to mistake the illusions of his own fancy for the laws of reality and the principles of truth."—Exim. "He appears never to think out his subject before he writes upon it. Very much of his philosophy, of his criticism, and of his invective, (and, whilst one of the greatest masters of diffused writing, he is one of the strongest in condensed invective,) is plainly the result of merely present feeling, and consequently involves him in all kinds of difficulties and inconsistencies, which much of his future time and temper is consumed in reconciling, denying, or explaining away. He is in fact one of the most impulsive of writers, whilst he also claims to be one of the most infallible. Hence he turns aside to settle every subject that happens to come under notice in the course of his investigation, (from the principles of Christianity and the empitimess of German philosophy, down to Gil Blas's immorbity, the worthlessness of railways for the conversion of the heathen, and the wantty of ladies' drosses, linetond of co

"Now it becomes us to inquire how this task has been performed. Our duty is to report that it is well, admirably, and nobly done. In method single, clear, and as a whole cloquents to a marvel, as the world knows; and, taken in the mass, these five volumes contain the most valuable contributions to artitiorature the language can show. Unstable, crotchety, passionate, too intense at times to be just, still they contain worlds of thought, imagination, and knowledge such as no ather art writer can educe. A strong and sarnest purpose runs through them all, given to the highest ofice. It is impossible but that Art should be the better for them, be it only through the open-ing of people's eyes to some of the secret chambers of art-poetry."—Lon. "The latter pictures of Turner," remarks an eminent historian, "when he indulged in a new and more vivid style of colouring, in which bright orange and saftron predominate, can hardly be sonsidered as his productions: they would be more aptly designated as the works of genus run mad. There is only one consolation in reflecting on this running rot of so much talent, and that is, that it has elicited the genus and displayed the taste and vivid powers of description of his accomplished advocate, Mr. Ruskin, who, in attempting to defend his extravagances, has only caused his ingenuity to be the more admired that it has obviously been excrted in an indoincible cause. His great and varied genius and taste appear equally conspicuous in his Seven Langs of Architecture,—one of the most profound and original works of the kind in the English inagongs."—Six Asconiaald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1816–52, chap. v.

"Mr. Ruskin Scenis to me one of the rew genuine writers, as distinguished from book-makers, of this age. His earnestness even amuses me in cottain passages, [in the Stones of Vonice;] for I cannot help laughing to think how uthindrians will fame and frot over his deep, serious, and (as they will think) fanatical revolunce for Art. That pure and severe mind you ascribed to him assage in agent line. He writes like a consectated priest. him speaks in every line. "Mr. Ruskin's writings have all the qualities of promature old age,—its coldness, callousness, and contraction. There is no development apparent in all he has written.... Its contradictions and false conclusions are from the beginning those of a cold and hurdened babit, in which no enthusness in irroluntarily leads astray and no generosity in-tinctively leads aright. Itis rewings of all that is most sacred in the past, and his insuits to all who are most sensitive in the present, bear the stamp of proceeding rather from an unfeeling heart than a hasty judgment; while such necessarily have been the vitinting effects upon himself of the unrestrained indulgence of these habits, that his latter works, as we shall have occasion to prove, show him to have arrived at a blind thodomontade of reasoning and a reckless viruleuce of language almost unparalleled in the annals of literature."—Lon. "Mr. Ruskin has been before the world for some years as the "Mr. Ruskin has been before the world for some years as the most voluminous, the most confident, and the most degmatic of arterities. He has astonished his roaders no less by his plantitudes than by his paradoxes. . . There is nothing more pauriti in Mr. Ruskin's writings than the total want of reverence for things human or divine that pervades them. The treasures of ancient art, from which successive ages have drunk deep draughts of inspiration, are to him nothing but stumbling-blocks in a dark valley of ruim. (Lectures, p. 219.) . . . Mystely and unintelligibility have in all ages been the grand resource of those who have wished to impose upon the guilibility of the world and to pass for being wiser than their neighbours. Quacks religious, quacks moral, quacks political, and quacks literary, have resorted to them, no less than quacks legal; and nowhere will they be found in greater abundance than in the ponderous tones with which, year after year, Mr. Ruskin burdens our grossing tables."—Blackes. And this, and many strictures such as this, is all the gratitude which Mr. Ruskin receives for his having solicited for "the present critic of Blackwood's Magasolicited for "the present critic of Blackwood's Magazine the respect due to honest, hopeless, helpless imbeniity." (Notes to 2d ed. of vol. i. of Modern Painters, 1844.) It will be remembered that Mr. Ruskin pays a later compliment to Blackwood in his remarks on the asricatinro in Punch (1857) which grievously offended Maga. On this occasion we witnessed on the part of the sloquent artist another solemn exhumation of the author of Endymion, who, Ziska-like, is still used to rally indignant authors to battle when they wage defensive war against hostile reviewers.

A commentator upon Mr. Ruskin in the London Critic Amarks.

cemarks,

"A kind of Wordsworth in prose, Ruskin probably deserves his immense reputation as little as Wordsworth deserved his. Himself a colourist, he is a critic only on colour. His descriptions the most yearned road to me like catalogues. I should decidedly say of Mr. Ruskin that he is more inventorial than inventive. He enumerates particulars, and he daubs over each particular with a glaring hue, and that is called painting. How differently have Walter Scott, John Wilson, Thomas Carlyle, and all who have excelled in descriptive power, painted! A somewhat lifeles being, Ruskin cannot produce life. He can write notes on sheep-folds, but he cannot enable us to see a living thing, a single sheep."

But we have kindlier judgments of Mr. Ruskin then

But we have kindlier judgments of Mr. Ruskin than these to quote before we pass to our next subject:

But we have kindlier judgments of Mr. Ruskin than these to quote before we pass to our next subject:

"Unquestionably," says Fraser's Magasins, "one of the most remarkable men of this—may we not say of any?—age is Mr. Ruskin. He is, if you like, not seldom dogmanic, self-contradetory, conceited, a rogant, and absurd; but he is a great and wonderful writer! He has created a new literature,—the literature of art. . . In the fulfilment of his glorious mission, Mr. Ruskin has been assisted by a style singularly clear, rich, and powerful. Every inventor of a new philosophy has in some sort to invent a new vocabulary; and Mr. Ruskin's perfect command of a language surpussing all others, dead or living, except Greek, has enabled him to do this with extraordinary success."

"For all his arrogance, dogmatism, and egotism, he is one of the most delightful and instructive of writers; and this because it is partly from a zualous love and uncompromising assertion of what he believes to be truth, that his arrogance and degmatism arise; for even error, eloquently advocated with the honest conviction that it is truth, is better than truth coldity believed and langually proclaimed.

"We value a writer not in proportion to his freedom from faults, but in proportion to his positive excellencies,—to the variety of thought he contributes and suggests, to the amount of gladdening and energizing cuectons he excites. Of what comparative importance is it that Mr. Ruskin undervalues this painter or overvalues the other, that he sometimes glides from a just argument into a fallacions one, that he is a little absurd here and not a little arrogant there, if, with all these collateral mistakes, he teaches truth of infinite value, and so teaches it that men will listen! The truth of infinite value, and so teaches it eatimed by a humble and institut study of nature, and not by substituting vague forms, bred by imagination on the masts of feeling, in place of definite, substantial reality. The thorough acceptance of this doctrine would remould

Russell, Rt. Hon. Lord John, M.P., raised to the perage in 1861 as Earl Russell, third and youngest son of the sixth Duke of Bedford by his first wife, the Viscount Torrington, was born in Hertford Street, London, August 18, 1792, was educated first at Westminster School and the University of Edinburgh, entered the House of Commons as member for Tavistock in 1813, and soon attained that prominence in the Whig ranks which he has wielded with more or less effect for many years. It is in his literary capacity that he is here to be considered: of his political life details will be found in several of the authorities noticed below.

Citizen, Lon., 1867.

Russell, Lady Rachel, 1636-1723, second daughter of Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, was married first to Lord Francis Vaughan, and after his death, in 1667, she became in 1660 the wife of Lord William Russell, third son of William, first Duke of Bedford. Her constancy to her husband in his misfortunes, her services in court as his amanuensis, and her efforts to save him from the fatal block, together with her Letters, first pub. fifty years after her death, have embalmed her memory in the hearts of thousands. Letters of Lady Rachel Russell, Lon., 1773, 4to; 1774, 8vo; 1792, 8vo; 1. p., r. 8vo; 1793, 8vo; l. p., r. 8vo; 6th ed., 1801, 3 vols. 8vo; 7th ed., 1809, 8vo; 1819, 2 vols. in 1, 12mo; 1820, 12mo and 24mo; 1821, 2 vols. 18mo; 1825, 18mo; 1825, 2 vols. 12mo; with additional letters, (see Lon. "This book has many great merits.... Its glaring defect is that much of it should never have been written at all. Names "Ins nook has many great merits.... is garing defect a that much of it should never have been written at all. Names are mentioned with a freedom not usually found in works referring to living persons... Mr. Russell's faults of taste are a grave offence not only against his hosts, but against his countrymen; since a traveller who commits breaches of confidence deprives the tourists who follow him of a hospitable reception."

To ordinary readers, Sancroft's memory has been kept alive more by his honest performance of an official duty than by any vitality in the productions of his pen. He was one of the group who witnessed the last agony of the ill-spent life of the second Charles:

"William Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, an honest and plous, though narrow-minded, man, used great freedom. "It is time," he said, 'to speak out; for, sir, you are about to appear before a Julge who is no respecter of persons." The king an-swered not a word,"—LORD MACAULAY: Hist. of England, chap. iv., (q. v.,) Index.

Sanders, Charles W., b, 1805, in Herkimer co., New York, commenced in 1838 the publication of these excellent school-books which have enabled so many millions of our fellow-countrymen to "climb" with some parative case and pleasure the first ascents of
"The steep where Fame's proud temple shines after."

We say "millions" have been thus introduced to a knowledge of their vernacular; and we shall not be charged with extravagance when it is considered that of Sanders's Readers more than 12,000,000 copies had been sold to November, 1860, and that the annual sale in 1864 was over 2,000,000 of copies. Of this enormous circulation, if the authority before us be not misinformed, Mr. Sanders has not been an entirely uninterested spectator:

Sanders, or Saunders, Nicholas, D.D., according to Wood "the most noted defender of the R. Cath. cause in his time," was b. at Charlewood, Surrey, about 1527; admitted Fellow of New College, Oxford, 1548; Regius Professor of Canon Law, Oxford, 1557; ordained priest at Rome, 1560, and accompanied Cardinal Stantslane Hosius to the Council of Trent, "where he show'd himself to be a man of great parts by his several dispu-tations and arguings;" resided for thirteen years at Lou-vain as assistant to Sir Francis Englefield, almoner to the King of Spain, who contributed largely to the relief the King of Spain, who contributed in reland, according to Pits, (De Illust. Ang. Script. set. 16, num. 1025,) in 1580; according to Rushton, (Pref. ad Sanderi De Orig. et Progress. Schism., 1585,) in 1581; according to Camden, (Annal. Reg. Elizab. sub an. 1583,) in 1585, Camden asserts that Sanders was one of the priests camen asserts that Sainters was one of the priests who instigated Gerald Fitzgerald's (Earl of Desmond) "rebellion," and that "very near at the same instant of time" when the latter was killed the former was "famished to death;" but all this is very doubtful; and, if true, men have come to their death in less innocent ways than through self-sacrificing devotion to their religion.

Sanders was the author of the following works: The Supper of our Lord set foorth in Six Bookes according to the Truth of the Gospell and Catholike Faith, &c., Lovanii, 1565, 4to; 1566, 4to. See Herbert's Typ. Antiq.; W. Strong's (Exeter) Cat. of Divinity, Pt. 3, 1830, No.

"That this work was suppressed, and that it was dangerous to read or have possession of a copy, cannot at all be doubted; thence we account for its rarity." See Butler's English Catholics.

To counteract the influence of this work, Elizabeth framed the Six Questions which were propounded by the Queen's command to all the R. C. missionaries, and to which satisfactory answers were required. Of these Questions the 2d and 5th refer to Father Sanders, and

"Whether the said Dr. Saunders in his booke of the Visible Monarchie of the Chrich (writing in allowance, commendation, and confirmation of the but of Pina quintus) have therein taught, testified, or maintained a truth or falsehood."

"Sufficient care has been taken by our learned Bishop Burnet [History of the Reformation] to guard the English Protestant reader against any mistake that this bold remancer might lead him into, by publishing a catalogue and refutation of his calumnies and lies. His style is generally clean and pretty, and his way of telling his tales is facetious enough and pleasant, so that the book may pass, with Argenis and Euphormio, for good diversion, but ought not to be relied on for sound history."—

"This is one of the earliest works against the Slave Trade, and was printed in America, (though not stated so.) for which the Chief Magistrate of the Province threatened the Author with a swers penalty if he permitted it to be circulated; but, disregarding all consequences, he distributed it gratuitously wherever he thought it would be read. These circumstances have now rendered it extremely rare."

"About the year 1729 or 1729 I myself printed a book for Raiph Sandyford, another of your Friends in this city, against keeping negroes in slavery; two editions of which he distributed gratia. And about the year 1736 I printed another book on the same subject, for Englandin Lay, who also professed being one of your Friends, and he distributed the books chiefly among them.

By these instances it appears that the seed was hubble sown in the good ground of your profession, though much earlier than the time you mention [1788].—Benjamin Franklin to John Wright, 4 Nov. 1789: Sparke's Franklin, x. 403.

4to. 3. A Vindication of Col. Sandys's Honour and Loyalty, 1612, 4to.

Sandys, George, 1577-1643-4, seventh and youngest son of Archbishop Sandys, (supra.) first saw the light in the archiepiscopal palace of Bishopsthorpe; in 1589 entered at St. Mary Hull, Oxford, and subsequently, Wood thinks, removed to Corpus Christi; from August, 1610, to 1612 or after, travelled extensively in the East; some time after his return to England sailed for America, where he succeeded his brother as Treasurer for the English Colony of Virginia, and on the banks of the James River completed his excellent translation of the Metamorphoses of Ovid; after his second return home, was ap-pointed a Gentleman of the King's Privy Chamber, and lived in great reputation for learning, amiability, and piety, until his death, at Bexley Abbey. Kent, the residence of his nicce, Lady Margaret Wyatt.

di Zuallardo, Romæ, 1587, 4to. Dr. Bliss (Wood's Athen. Oxon., iii. 93) asserts that the prints were immediately copied from Le Tresdevot Voyage de Jerusalem, Antwerp, 1608. Of the value of the text there is no doubt. "The descriptions and dranghts of our learned, sugaclous countryman, Mr. Sandys, respecting the romarkable places in and about Jerusalem, must be acknowledged so faithful and perfect that they loave very little to be added by after-comers, and nothing to be corrected."—MAUNDRELE, p. 68.

"It needeth," says Sandys in his Dedication to Charles I.,
"more than a single desization, being a double stranger. Sprung from the stock of ancient Romanes, but hred in the New World, of the sadness whereof it can but participate; especially having wars and tunuit to bring it to light instead of the Muses; snatcht from the howers of night and repose, for the day was not mine, but dedicated to the service of your Great Father, and yourselfe."

But no such apology was needed: Dryden, although he thinks the version of Ovid too close and literal, calls "the ingenious and learned Sandys the best versider of the former age," (Pref. to Dryden's Fables.) and esteemed so highly his translation of the First Book of the Engls as to easert that if Sandys had translated the whole of Virgil he would not have attempted it after him. (Pref. to Dryden's trans. of Virgil: see, also, Cibber's Lives, i. 284; Scott's Dryden.) Pope's admiration of Sandys's Ovid has been already referred to, (Octlby, or Octlby, John, No. 3: sec, also, Spence's Ance., sec. vii.; Dr. Johnson's Life of Pope, P. Mr. Sargent's translation of De Celano's Dies Irus was recently brought prominently before the public by the accomplished literary editor of The Press, (Philadelphia, Oct. 27, 1859,) R. Shelton Mackenzie, M.D., D.C.L.; and his poem of A Life on the Ocean Wave see Living Age, ii. 250) has long been a favourite with all classes. Less known than the last-named, but preferred by Mr. Poc, (see The Literati,) are A Calm, The Gale, Tropical Wenther, (three of the quatorzains entitled Records of a Summer Voyage to Cuba,) and the Night-Storm at Sea. The ballad of The Light of the Light-House is another of Poe's favourites. Specimens of Mr. Sargont's poems are given in Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America, and in Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Literature. He contributed an Introduction to The King of the Mountains, from the French of Edmond About, by Mary L. Booth, Boston, 1860, (2 edits.,) 12mo, noticed in N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1861, 283, (by t. C. Felton:) and edited The Gen Series: vol. i., The Emerald, 1866; vol. ii., The Supphire, 1866.

Sarjeant, Sargeant, or Sergeant, John, sometimes called Smith, sometimes Holland, b. at Barrow, Leicestershire, about 1621; admitted of St. John's College, Cambridge, 1639; went over to the English R. Catholic college of secular priests at Lisbon, in 1642; returned to England in 1652; became secretary (he was already a priest) of the secular elergy; published about forty controversial volumes or pamphlets, (against Ham-mond, Bramhall, Thomas Pierce, Tillotson, Cassuben, Taylor, Tenison, Stillingfieet, Whithy, Descartes, Locke, &c.,) some under the signature of J. S.; and d. with the pen in his hand, in 1707, in his 86th year. See Birch's Tillotson; Dodd's Ch. Hist.; Athen. Oxon., (Sarjeant; Sargeant;) Watt's Bibl. Brit., (Sergeant.) The writings of this acute reasoner have been greatly neglected; but a few years since attention was called to their value by the publication (in 1860) of Sir William Hamilton's Loctures on Logic:

"His works, however, contain genius more than enough to have saved them, in any other country, from the total oblivion into which they have failed in this,—where, theired, they probably never were appreciated."—Uld supra, Appendax X.

"We are glad to find that Mr. Savage has not contented himself with improving on the verbal labours of his predecessor. He has added an Appendix. consisting of a number of authentic letters, and constituting, in our opinion, the nost interesting portion of Governor Winthop's writings, and has enriched the work with a large number of original and able notes."—J. C. GRAY: N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1827, 23-27.

"For resolute accuracy Savage is infromoble; his like will not soon be found. As we read his notes, we sometimes wish he had hated fanatisisma little less, and been a little more tolerant of bigotry. But on that matter opinions will be divided."—J. C. PLINERY: N. Amer. Rev., April, 1823, 481-82.

Navage, Richard, Jan. 1696-7-July 31, 1743, the reputed child of the Counters of Macelesticid and her marging Lord Rivers, has through the medium of his paramour Lord Rivers, has, through the medium of his great biographer, secured a literary immortality which neither his ordinary poetry nor his extraordinary story sould have gained him. That Steele, Johnson, and his contemporaries generally believed in the identity of the post with the son of the peeress, is certain; that others—such as Cust and Boswell, (see Boswell's Johnson, chap. vii...) Galt. (Lives of the Players.) and Do Quincey believed no such thing, we have their own affirmation:

neneword no such thing, we have their own affirmation:
"Let us not be supposed," says the English Option-Enter, "to believe the lying legend of Savage: he was doubtless no son of Lady Macclesfield, but an impostor, who would now be sent to the treadmit."—Life of thee, in Energe, Brit.: repub, in De Quincey's Bog, Essays, Bost., 1851, 166.

But the question of birth and the narrative of his anhappy and disreputable life can be pendered at his leisure by the curious reader, in one of the noblest compositions in which genius over pleaded for vice or bio-graphy paid tribute to friendship. And it is still less incumbent upon us to linger upon the sad details of Savage's miserable career, since the publication (in 1854) of the illustrative notes which Mr. Peter Cunningham, in his edition of Johnson's Lives of the Poets, has appended to the original narration. By the latter the account of Savage, by Aaron Hill, in the Plain Dealer for June 26, 1724, and the Life, by Beckingham and another person, 1724, and the life, by becking and another person, published in 1727, 8vo, were superseded: though both are still desirable as bibliographical cariceities.

By the kind offices of Lady Mason, the mother of the Counters of Macclesfield, and Mr. Lloyd, the sponsor of the shild, the infant son of the Counters was carefully nursed, and in due time placed in a grammar-school near St. Alban s. Whilst still at this place of instruction, his father, Lord Rivers, died, and, according to Dr. Johnson, was only prevented from leaving the child £6000 by the assurance of the mother that the offspring so unhappily ushered into the world had been removed by death. It is contended by Johnson that the child lived and grew up to be known as Savage the poet: it is argued by others (see references above cited) that the child was really dead, and that Savage was a life-long impostor. After some experience as a shocmaker's apprentice, the youth at a very early life turned his attention to literature; recommended himself to the wits partly by his supposed de-scent, and not a little by the charms of his conversation; in 1727 was condemned to death for having slain a man in a tavern brawl, and owed his life to the royal elemency obtained by the intercession of the Countess of Hertford; produced from Lord Tyreonnel a pension of £200 a year and a place in his family, on condition of his abandoning a design of exposing the crucky of his reputed mother; forfeited these advantages by his had conduct, and was again thrown on his pen for a precarious sup-port; in 1731-2 appealed to Queen Charlotte by verses in honour of her birthday, entitled The Volunteer Lau-rest, of which six numbers (the first in quarte, the others in folio) were published in as many years, (until the death of the Queen in 1787,) and for which he received $50 per annum; in 1739 agroed to retire to Wales upon a pension raised by Popa and other friends, but remained until Soptember, 1742, in Bristol, and on his return to January 10, 1742–3, and there d., August i, 1743.

For the list four years of his life he subsisted principally on £20 per annum, allowed him by the benevolence

1. The largest six linears of six linears over the state of the largest as much—£100. The Preface contains a "liberal encomium on the blooming excellence of Mr. Theophilus Cibber."

5. Miscellaneous Poems and Translations, by Several Hands, 1726, 8vo, pp. 77. Aaron Hill promoted the subscription and furnished the greatest part of the poems. The Happy Man he published as a specimen. 6. The Bastard; a Poem: Inscribed, with all due reverence, to Mrs. Bret, once Countess of Macclesfield, 1728, 8vo; 5th ed., 1728. This drove the Countess from Bath "to shelter herself among the crowds of London." It is perhaps the best piece of the poet, who chose thus to appropriate a title seldom coveted. 7. The Wanderer; a Moral Poem, 1729. Sold for ten guineas, of which he returned two for a correct impression of the last two sheets.

"This performance was always considered by himself as his master-piece; and Mr. Pope, when he asked his opinion of it, told han that he read it once over and was not displeased with it, that it gave him mora pleasure at the second perusal, and delighted him still more at the third. . . This must be at least acknowledged, which ought to be thought equivalent to many other excellences, that this poom can promote no other purposes than those of virtue, and that it is written with a very strong sense of the efficacy of religion."—Da. Johnson: Life of Nargae.

Strage.

"Did you ever read Savage's beautiful poem of 'The Wanderet'! If not, do so, and you will see the fault which I think attaches to Lord Maxwell,—a want of distinct precision and in telligibility about the story, which counteracts, especially with ordinary readers, the effect of beautiful and forcible diction, poetical imagery, and animated description."—Six Patter Sout to Allan Cunningham, 77th April, 1821: Lockhart's Life of Scott, chap, i.

He at last determined to divide it into weekly or monthly numbers, that the profits of the first might supply the expenses of the next." son's Life of Savage.)

What the author failed to do was at last accomplished by T. Evans, a bookseller, who in 1775 (reissued in 1777) collected and published, in 2 vols. 12mo, The Works of Richard Savage, Esq., with Johnson's Life of his friend prefixed. Johnson's biography, originally pab. in 1744, Svo, again in 1707, 12mo, and incorporated in his Lives of the English Poets, has already been sufficiently noof the English Poets, has already been sufficiently noticed. But we must not comclude our sketch without a few lines from the partial pen of the poet's illustrious biographer:

the poet's illustrious biographer:

"Such were the life and death of Richard Savage, a man equally distinguished by his virtues and vices, and at once remarkable for his weaknesses and abilities... On a bulk, in a sellar, or in a gigan-house, among thieves and beggare, was to be found the author of 'The Wanderer,' the man of exalted sentiments, extensive views, and curious observations; the man whose remarks on life might have assisted the atatesman, whose ideas of virtue might have enlightened the norallet, whose elequence might have influenced senties, and whose delicacy might have polished courts... Ills writings may improve mankind when his failings shall be forgetten." Juleson's Life of Savage, Cunningham's ed., 393, 411, 440.

His "writings" are now too little known to "improve mankind;" his "failings" can never be "forgotten," so long as the strength and beauty of English prose in its best estate shall attract successive generations of ad-

"Mr. Sawyer writes excellent English, and his satirical wein reminds us of Thackersy's, except that it is not at all ill-natured."
—Dr. R. S. MACKENEIE.

We have before us many other communications of Mr. Sawyer's three books.

Mr. Sawyer is also known as the originator and President of The Pawner's Bank, of Boston, an excellent institution, (which should be imitated in all large com-munities,) designed to furnish facilities at a comparatively low rate of interest to the poorer classes.

Saxe, John Godfrey, LL.D., b. in Highgate, Vermont, 1816; graduated at Middlebury College, 1839; was admitted to the Bar, 1843, and commenced practice at St. Alban's, in his native State. In 1850 he removed to Burlington, Vermont, and for five years successfully conducted The Sentinel in that city. The discharge of the duties of his profession has been occasionally relieved by literary lectures and (if this can be called a relief) by some attention to politics. In both capacities he has prospered: his lectures are crowded; he has been State's Attorney and Deputy-Collector of Customs, and was some time since the Democratic candidate for Governor of Vermout. The best-known of his poetical lectures are Progress, a Satire, (1846;) The Rape of the Lock, (1847;) The Proud Miss McBride, (1848;) The Times, (1847;) The Proud Miss McBride, (1848;) The Times, (1849;) The Monoy-King, (1851;) Literature and the Times, (1855.) Neander, indeed, of whom Dr. Schaff has given us such interesting reminiscences, (see his Germany, 261-277.) predicted with confidence the future distinction of his beloved disciple. He was "not disappointed of his his beloved disciple. He was not desappointed at the hope:" before the good tutor closed his eyes in death he was permitted to enjoy the first-fruits of the seeds of that knowledge which he had so assiduously planted. In November, 1862, Dr. Schaff was invited to spend three months at Andover Theological Seminary, to deliver a course of Lectures on Ecclesiastical History, and he occupied that chair until 1867; in 1868 he was elected Professor of Church History in the Hartford Theological

"This is the first learned theological work in German composed in the United States, and undoubtedly the best published on that subject in that country. I hall the work in both respects, as the harbinger of a great and glorious future. It is worthy of a German scholar, of a disciple of Neander, (to whom the work is dedicated,) a citizen of the United States, and of a believing and free Christian and Protestant. It stands on German ground, but it is mone the less original for that."—CENTALIER BUNGER: Hippolytus.

Schoolcraft, Henry Rowe, LL.D., a son of Colonel Lawrence Schoolcraft, of the American Revolutionary Jawrence Schoolcraft, of the American Revolutionary army, and the great-grandson of James Caleraft, (such was the ancient patronymic of the family,) who emigrated from England during the wars of Queen Anne, was born in Guilderland, near Albany, N. York, March 28, 1793; studfed for some time in Union College, and at an early age commenced that course of geographical exploration and archaeological research which conferred such merited distinction on his name. In 1822 his eminent services were recognized by governmental appointment of Agent for Indian Affairs on the Northwestern Frontiers; and a residence of nearly twenty years at Michilimackinac, varied by occasional journeys through the surrounding regions, afforded abundant opportunity for his favourite investigations into the history, traditions, customs, and philology of the Indians of North America. enstoms, and philology of the indians of North America. In all, Mr. Schoolcraft spent thirty years among the Indians: see No. 36, infra. From 1828 to 1832 he was a member of the Territorial Legislature; in 1828 organized the Michigan Historical Society; and in 1832 founded the Algie Society at Detroit. In 1841 he removed to New York, in 1842 visited England and the Continent, and in 1845 was employed by the Legislature of New York to take a census of the Six Nations, (Indian tribes: see No. 26, infra.) Also trans. into French and German. This treatise, which attacked the belief in witches, astrology, alchemy, legerdemain, and other generally-received opinions, was assailed from time to time with great severity: James I. ordered all the copies of the 1st edition that could be found to be burnt, (vide Vogt. Cat. Lib. Rar., p. 617,) and asserts that he wrote his Demonologic "chiefly against the damnable opinions of Wierus and Scot," (Preface;) Meric Casaubon treats Scot as an illiterate person; and Dr. John Rainoldes, (Pra-lectiones upon the Apocrypha,) Joseph Glanvil, (q. v., Nos. 3 and 10.) and Richard Bernard, (Guide to Grand Jurymen,) all take the skeptic to task. Notices of Scot's Discoucrie will be found in Bliss's Wood's Athon Owen. (520, Oldre's Vibraria 112, 531, W.) Athen. Oxon., i. 679; Oldys's Librarian, 213; Sir Walter Scott's Lotters on Demonology and Witcheraft; Drake's Shaksp. and his Times, (Shakspeare evidently knew the book,) and the Shakeperian notes of Steevens and Malone; Hallam's Lit. Hist, of Europe; Retrospec. Rov., v. 86. We may gladly admit the erudition and virtue of Scot without endorsing the perhaps rather extravagant commondation of Hallam, who remarks,

"It may easily be supposed that this solid and learned person, for such he was beyond almost all the English of that age, did not escape in his own time, or long afterwards, the consure of those who adhered to superstitun."—Ithis supra, ed. 1849, 1.572.

lines now generally known are those estitled An Ode on Hearing the Drum:

"I hate that drum's discordant sound,
Parading round, and round, and round," &c.

The Monthly Review, still "faithful found," was prompt to bestow its usual generous praise on the bard; but not so politic was the Uritical Review, whose raillery provoked the smiable poet to put forth a very lib-advised and egotistical (7) Letter to the Critical Reviewers. An interesting notice of this unhappy business will be found in Disraeli's Calamities of Authors, (chapter on Undue Severity of Criticism; it was copied by Pro-fessor Wilson in Blackwood's Magazine, xil. 770-71. This paper of Wilson we have already referred to in our account of Bernard Barton, (p. 136, supra.)

"Scott of Amwell," remarks the critic, "was, we believe, rather a popular versifier in his day; but he was fire inferior to Mr. Barton. He was rather given to drivelling, and did not fully and freely exercise the little power he possessed."

Washald not forest to state that one outless a Michael

We should not forget to state that our author published answers to Dr. Johnson's three pamphlets, Patriot, Palse Alarm, and Taxation no Tyranny, and contributed to the Gentleman's Magazine his first poetical ossays, and some letters adverse to the authenticity claimed by Chatterton for the so-called Poems of Thomas Rowley. Soott had many friends, was twice married, and in the social circle and at the fireside was one of the most amiable and agreeable, as in the discharge of his selfimposed and self-denying public employments he was one of the most useful, of men. Let the memory of such be held " in everlasting remembrance"!

Scott, John, the editor of the London Magazine, commenced by him in January, 1820, was fatally wounded at the age of 37, by Mr. Christie, in a duel at Chalk Farm, by moonlight, February 16, 1821, in consequence of a literary quarrel carried on between Blackgood's Magazine and Christie's periodical. Scott died Feb. 20. Unfortunately, the murderer was not hanged, as all murderers should be. The details of this foolish and wicked affair will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag.,

Scott, Mar. Winter Tales, Lon., 12mo. Scott, Sir Michael, celebrated as a scholar, astrologor, alchemist, magician, and wizard, was h. in Scotland about 1214; studied at Oxford and Paris; resided for some years at the court of the emperor Frederick II. in Germany; subsequently engaged in public life in England, and finally retired to his native country, where he died, probably between 1295 and 1300. Whether he was the same man as Michael Scott of Balwirie, or whether he died in 1291, according to the common statement, and other mooted points connected with his career, may per-haps be determined by the curious reader when he has endeavoured to digest the versions of Boethins, Camden, Dompster, Mackenzie, and other ancient authorities, and the modern summaries in Edin. Mag., 1820, and English Cyc., v., 1857, 366. See, also, Recher, crit, sur l'Age et l'Origine des Traductions Latines d'Aristote, par M. Jourdain, nouv. éd., Paris, 1843: Milman's Lat. Scott, Michael, 1789-1835, a native of Glasgow, educated at the High School and the University of that city, was engaged in the management of several estates ity, was engaged in the management of in Jamaica from 1806 until 1810, when he joined a mercantile house in Kingston. He returned home in 1817, was married in 1818 and returned to Januaics, but in 1822 settled permanently in Scotland. In 1829 he commenced the publication in Blackwood of those brilliant papers known as Tom Cringle's Log and The Cruise of the Midge. These were subsequently collected into vol-umes: repub.: Tom Cringle's Log, Phila., 1833, 2 vols. 8vo; N. York, 8vo; Craise of the Midge, Phila., 1834, 8vo; N. York, 8vo; also trans. into German; last Edinburgh edits., 1868, 12mo, each. They were warmly commended by the London Quarterly Reviewer, ("the most brilliant series of magazine papers of the time,") Coleridge, in his Table-Talk, (" most excellent,") John Wilson, in Noctes Ambrosianzo, October, 1832, 695, ("Cringle indeed is a giant,") and by many others: yet to no one, not even to Wilson or Blackwood, was the name of the author known until after his death. Among those to whom the authorship was ascribed were Captains Chamier and Marryat, and Professor Wilson. See Index to Blackw. Mag., vols. i.-l., 1855, 121, 537; Lon. Month. Rev., exxxii. 411; Amer. Scott. Thomas. D.D. the Commentator. 1747-1821.

Scott, Thomas, D.D., the Commentator, 1747-1821, the tenth of the thirteen children of a Lincolnshire grazier, after an unsatisfactory probation for two months as a surgeon's apprentice and for nine years as a farm-labourer, acquired an education by untiring assiduity; in 1772 was made a deacon, and in 1773 received priest's orders from Dr. Green, the Bishop of Lincoln. He subsequently experienced a spiritual change through the influence of the Rev. John Newton, of Olney, and was distinguished through life by his eloquent advocacy was distinguished through the by his elequent advocacy of those great religious doctrines the efficacy of which he had so thoroughly tested in his own person. Shortly after his ordination he was appointed Curate of Weston Underwood: in 1780 succeeded John Newton at Olney; in 1785 accepted the situation of Lecturer of Lock Hospital, London, to which was soon added a Sundaymorning and weekday lectureship in the metropolis, and from 1803 until his doath was Rector of Aston Sandford, Buckinghamshire. He received the degree of D.D. from Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, in 1807. 1. The retail price of the English copies would amount to the sum of 67,60%, that of the American copies, to 132,00%, making tegether 189,000. Probably no theological work can be named which produced by its saile during the Author's lifetime an equal sum. Since 1823 a wast number of editions have been printed, both in England and America, and the aggregate sum already expended by the public for copies of this great work must considerably exceed five hundred thousand pounds." This cultion was preceded by impressions, each in 6 vols. 4to, in 1835, 1839, and 1841, and succeeded by impressions, each in 6 vols. 4to, in 1852, 1856, and 1861. The plates were purchased in 1852 from Seeley, Hatchard & Nisbet, by Wettheim & Macintosh, also of London, who (now Wertheim, Macintosh & Hunt) still publish the work. The American reprint of this edition (1850, 6 vols. 4to) was issued in 1855, 5 vols. 4to, by Wm. S. Martien, of Philadelphia, and is now pub. by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., of the same city. It was asserted that up to 1855 there had been sold in England and America 100,000 copies of this valuable work. To these must be added (we know not how many) copies of a translation into French. The price of the London editions, formerly eight guineas, is now three guineas. There was also pub in 1830, London, 3 vols. imp. 8vo. An edition of the Connentary, with a Selection and Abridgment of the Notes, and a new arrangement of the Practical Observations, edited by the Rev. Josiah Pratt, (assisted by his father, Rev. Josiah Pratt, Sr.,) without the Marginal References, Renderings, (some are retained,) and Philological Notes; and in this incomplete state impressions, each in 3 vols. imp. 8vo, were issued in 1834, 1841, 1817, and 1860. Another edition of the Commentary, edited, with Notes, by Rev. William Symington, D.D., of Glasgow, was pub. in 1845-49, in 25 Pts. r. 4to,-bound in 3 vols.; and Fisher's Illustrated Edition, in 3 vols. 4to,—with 42 plates, 42s.: with 140 plates, 70s., —was pub. in 1849. The Holy Bible, with the Practical Observations extracted from the larger work, was pub. in 1834, 2 vols. r. 810; Phila., 1844, 8vo. The abridged edition of Henry and Scott pub. by the London Religious Tract Society (repub. in N. York) has been already noticed in our life of HENRY, MATTHEW, p. 824, enpru: a new edition was put to press in 1860. Nor should we omit to mention The Practical and Devotional Family omit to mention The Practical and Devotional Family Bible, being the Authorized Version, with the Commentaries of Henry and Scott, condensed by the Rev. John McFarlane, LLD., Glasgow, London and Glasgow, 8th ed., 1859. A Topical Index to Scott's Commentary, pub. in 1842 in 4to and imp. 8vc. sold separately at 6s. and 4s.; but this, together with 15 Maps and 69 Thustrations of Sevinture Segment are all bound up with Thustrations of Scripture Scenery, are all bound up with the excellent edition of Wertheim, Macintosh & Hunt. But let the last edition (1869, 3 vols. r. 3vo) of Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, and Dr. Wm. Smith's New Dictionary of the Bible, accompany the Commentary. Surely this formidable array of editions may excuse the absence of formal certificates to the value of Scott's Commentary: yet a few words of carnest commendation, from eminent authorities, shall not be withheld:

arom eminent authorities, shail not be withheld:

"The capital excellency of this valuable and immense undertaking, perhaps, consists in following more closely than any other the fair and adequate meaning of every part of Scripture, without regard to the nicetics of human systems: it is, in every sense of the expression, a scriptural comment. It has likewise a further and strong recommendation in its originality."—Bissor Danker, Witson, of Calcutta: Scrma., preached April 29, 1821, eccasioned by the death of the Rev. Thomas Scott, 3d ed., 83-88

After quoting this and much more from Bishop Wilson,

In the Life of Daniel Wilson by Josiah Bateman, 1888, 2 vols. Svo, we find that Scott's Commentary rateined its favour with the good bishop. On his voyage to India in 1832, he remarks, favour with the good bishop. On his voyage to Indis in 1832, he remarks,

"Father Scott's comment is my companion—wholesome, grounding, nourishing my inmost soul;" and at a later day he writes,

"But, after all my new authors, it turn back to my old consistent too, Scott, with a fresh seet. I am new in Easkiel, in my and and course; and I sit with astonishment at many of his grave and deep remarks, and, I hope, turn them into prayers. That book is not yet sufficiently valued. I have now been reading him for forty years; and my indigment is that he surpasses all other commentators by far, with the single exception of the incomparable John Calvin, who, considering the age when he wrote, stands a prodigy of sound interpretation of inspired Scripture and of real learning."—1800, 80.

"If Scott's Bible might be diligently and seriously perseed, and its spirit inhibed, by every family throughout this country, the consequences as to their temporal and eternal welfare would be most happy."—Rev. Provenson Lexand Weons, of Aulover.

"His Commentary was a noble gift to the Church of Christ, and furnishes ms with the solid interpretation of a men of a powerful mind and great good sense, giving his con views wisely, treely, and plainly. . . . "The Commentary, as a whole, is distinguished by many important qualities, and is not likely to be soon superseded....
There is an invariable combination of pointed, practical instruction with doctrinal illustration. If the resider apply to it for the tion with doctrinal illustration. If the resider apply to it for the solution of mounte critical difficulties, or the rainoval of obscurities which attach to many of the terms and phrases of Scripture, he will often be disappointed. The scope of a difficult paragraph is often autotantially given, when the minor difficulties are neglected. Indeed, no man who writes a commentary on the Bible can be expected to do justice to all its parts, or to study the innumerable allusions, thoms, and other peculiarities which belong to so extensive and so warled a composition as the Scriptures, "—Orme's Hibb. Scott, Sir Walter, Baronet, August 15, 1771-September 21, 1832, a native of Edinburgh, was a younger son of Walter Scott, Esq., Writer to the Signet, by Anue, daughter of Dr. John Rutherford, Professor of the Prac-

"My father's grandfather was Walter Scott, well known in Tovioidale by the surame of Berudie. He was the second son of Walter Scott, first Laird of Rachurn, who was the third son of Sir William Scott, and the grandson of Walter Scott, commonly called in tradition And Walt, of Harden. I am therefore imaskly descended from that ancient chieftain whose name I have made to ring in many a ditry, and from his fair dame, the Flower of Yarrow,—no lead genealogy for a border minstrel. . . I was an uncommonly healthy chid, but had nearly died in consequence of my first nurse being ill of a consumption, a circumstance which she chose to conceal, though to do so was murder to both herself and me. She went privately to consult Dr. Bisois, the celebrated professor of chemistry, who put my father on his guard. The woman was dismissed, and I was consigned to a healthy peasent, who is still allive to base of her laddiceling what she calls grand gratieness. I showed every sign of health and strength until I was eighteen months old. One night, I have been often told, I showed great reluctance to be saught and put to bed, and, after being chased about the room, was apprehended, and consigned to my dermitory with some difficulty. It was the last time I was to show such personal agility. In the morning I was discovered to be affected with the fiver which often accompanies the cutting of large tech. It had me three days. On the fourth, when they went to bathe time as was discovered that I had lost the power of my right leg."—Ashessis Progress, written 1808.

The affectionate solicitude of Miss Janet was not con fined to the physical welfare of her little ward:

"Two or three old books which lay in the window-seaf [at Sandy Knowe] were explored for my amusement in the tedious winter days. Automathes and Ramsay's Tea-Table Miscellanies were my favouritey, although, at a later period, an odd volume of Jasephus's Wars of the Jews divided my partiality.
"My kind and affectionate aunt, Miss Janet Scott, whose memory will ever be dear to me, used to read these works to me with admirable patience, until I could repeat long passages by heart. The ballad of Hardyknute I was early master of, to the great annoyance of almost our only visitor, the worthy elergyman of the parish, Dr. Duncan, who had not patience to have a solver clust interrupted by my shouting forth this ditty. Methinks I now see his tall, thin, emacinted figure, his legs cased in clusped gambadoes, and his face of a length that would have rivalled the Knight of La Mancha's, and hear him exclaiming, 'One may as well speak in the mouth of a cannon as where that child is!"—Ashestiel Fragment.

But the youthful rhapsodist was sometimes favoured with more patient auditors; and to one of these we are indebted for a graphic account of an interview with little Walter when he was about six years and four months old:

"I last night supped in Mr. Walter Scott's. He has the most extraordinary genius of a boy I ever saw. He was reading a poon to his mother when I wrut in. I made him read on: it was the description of a shipwreck. His passion rose with the storm. He lifted his cyos and hands: "There's the mast gone, says he; 'Crash it goes! They will all perish!' After his agitation, he turns to me: 'That is too melancholy,' says he; 'I had better read you something more anusing.' I preferred a little chat, and asked his opinion of Milton and other books he was reading, which he gave me wonderfully. One of his observations was, 'How strange it is that Adam, just new come into the world, should know every thing! That must be the poet's fancy, 'ays he. But when told he was created perfect by God, he in-tantly yielded. When taken to bed last night, he told his aunt he liked that lady. 'What lady!' says she. 'Why, Mrs. Cockburn; for I think she is a virtuoso.' 'Don't ye know? Why, it's one who wishes and will know every thing.' Now, sir, you will think this a very silly story. Pray, what age do you suppose this boy to be? Name it, now, before I tell you. 'Why, twelve or fourteen.' No such thing: he is not quite six years old. He has a lame leg, for which he was a year at Bath, and has acquired the perfect English accent, which he has not lost since he came, and he reads like a Garrick. You will allow this an uncommon exotic."—Mrs. Cockburn to Rec. Dr. Douglas, 1777: Lockburt's Life of Scott, chap, ii.

The autobiographer continues with an account of the

The autobiographer continues with an account of the nature of his studies at the University of Edinburgh, the Latin, Greek, and Logic classes of which he attended in the years 1783 and 1784. Four years later he was a delighted auditor of the Lectures on Ethics of Dugald Stewart; and during this or his previous term at college he acquired a superficial acquaintance with some branches of the mathematics and several heads in civil municipal law, and a more familiar knowledge of the prominent points of history. His reflections on this portion of his life, made in his thirty-seventh year, carry a lesson which will be endorsed by many thoughtful seniors, and, we fear, will be endorsed by many thoughtst sentors, and, we lear, profited of by but few juniors:

"If it should ever fall to the lot of youth to peruse these pages, let such a reader remember that it is with the deepest regret that I recollect in my manhoul the opportunities of learning which I neglected in my youth, that through every part of my literary career I have felt pinched and hampered by my own ignorance, and that I would, at this moment, give half the repetation I have had the good fortune to acquire, if by doing so I sculff rest the remaining part upon a sound foundation of learn. I ally as it will entrance the interest of the more apreling and solence."

To his collegiate acquisitions he added in later life what may be called (if we may be allowed to coin a convenient phrase) a free-translation knowledge of German, Span-ish, and French, and a vast fund-not always accurate. but ever ready—of British archæology: a department of learning which no one better knew how to use, and which

few have made so attractive to the general reader. His stock of romantic lore, the beginnings of which, as we have just seen, were accumulated in early youth, was greatly increased towards the close of the year 1784 by a diligent use of the leisure of a sick-room, the tedium of which was enlivened by the contents of a circulating library largely composed of the records of deeds of chivalry,-" the ponderous folios of Cyrus and Cassandra, down to the most approved works of modern times." To classical scholarship he had no pretensions at any time of life; of the "little Latin and less Greek" which he carried from college, the first received but slender additions, and the last, even to the alphabet, gradually faded from a mind in which it never found a congenial soil. In May, 1786, the young dreamer was recalled to the realities of an every-day working world by entering into indentures, with his father, of apprenticeship as a Writer to the Signet; in 1791 he was admitted by the Faculty of Advocates to his first trials, and in 1792 was called to the Bar: in 1799 became Sheriff of Selkirkshire, with a salary of £300, and in March, 1806, was appointed one of the principal Clerks of the Court of Session .- the full endowment of which post (about £1200 a year) he did not receive until the death of Mr. George Home, in 1812. He was made a baronet in 1820, and was elected President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh in the same year. So much for the rise and progress of the reputation and employments of the aspiring practitioner of law; but this proverbially "jealous mis-tress" was by no means allowed the undivided empire with which alone she is declared to be content: in 1796 the advocate had published a book, translations of Bürger's Lenore and Der Wilde Jüger, and in 1797 he had married a wife, Miss Charlotto Margaret Carpenter, a daughter of Jean Charpentier, a royalist of Lyons, who was "taken from the evil to come" at the commencement of the ill-starred Revolution which in its issues deluged Continental Europe in blood and hampered England with debt. Of the merits of the poem the resider can judge for himself; of the charms of the bride we have a pencil-sketch by Mr. Lockhart:

pencil-sketch by Mr. Lockhart:
"Without the features of a regular beauty, she was rich in personal attractions." a form that was fishhoned as light as a fay's;" a complexion of the clearest and lightest olive, eyes large, deep-set, and dazzing, of the finest Italian brown, and a profusion of silken tresses, black as the raven's wing; her address hovering between the reserve of a pretty young Englishwoman who has not mingled largely in general society, and a certain natural archaess and gaiety that anited well with the accompanion of a French accent. A lovelier vision, as all who temember her in the bloom of her days have assured me, could hardly have been imagined; and from that hour the fate of the young poet was fixed."—Life of Scott, chap, vii.

Two years after his marriage to this "lovely vision."

Two years after his marriage to this "lovely vision," (i.e. in 1799,) Scott published a translation of Göthe's Goetz of Berlichingen, and shortly afterwards composed a number of ballads,—William and Ellen, The Eve of St. John. Glenfinlas, The Fire King, &c., already sufficiently noticed on a preceding page, (Lewis, MATTHEW GRE-GORY, M.P., No. 12; Tales of Wonder, 1801, 2 vols. 8vo.)

Reserving a minute and elfronological enumeration of Scott's publications for a later portion of this article, we descend at one step to the year 1805, when, by the hearty admiration accorded The Lay of the Last Minstrel, our author was raised to that commanding position in the eye of the literary public which, either as poet or novelist, he maintained with undiminished honours for the next quarter of a century. A collection of his Ballads and Lyrical Pieces, in one volume octavo, followed in 1806; Marmion delighted the world in 1808; The Lady of the Lake, in 1810; the Vision of Don Roderick, in 1811; Rokeby and The Bridal of Triermain, in 1813; The Lord of the Isles, in 1814; and Harold the Dauntiess. in 1817.

But to retrace our steps: in 1814 there was published anonymously, at Edinburgh, in three volumes, a histori-cal romance, which, from several causes,—its own extraordinary merits, its position as the first-fruits of a new school of fiction, and especially as the first of a long line of illustrious descendants which bear its name,-will always command the respect of the bibliographer as effectu-reader to the latest generation.

Whilst the world was still wondering over the author-Water too work was been wounded you had again the pages, of Waverloy, now food for speculation and delight was afforded in 1815 by the publication of Guy Mannering; in the next year "the wonder grew" by the addition of The Antiquary, and Tales of my Landlord, First Series, (The Black Dwarf, and Old Mortality) in 1818 appeared Rob Roy, and Tales of my Landlord, Second Series, (The Heart of Mid Lothian:) in 1819, Tales of my Landlord, Third Series, (The Bride of Lammermoor, and A Legend of Montrose,) and Ivanhoe; in 1820. The Victorary, of Montrose,) and Ivanhoe; in 1820. The Visionary, The Monastery, and The Abbot; in 1821. Kenilworth; in 1822, The Pirate, and The Fortunes of Nigel; in 1823, Peveril of the Peak, and Quentin Durward; in 1824, St. Ronan's Well, and Red Gauntlet: in 1825, Tales of the Crusaders, (The Betrethed, and The Talisman;) in 1826—but, alas! we have come to an eventful year in the history of the Great Magician who had thus rapidly enlarged the Republic of Letters by a domain so wide in extent, so charming in scenery, so diversified in population ! From the first publication of Waverley, many eyes bad been turned towards Walter Scott, and each succeeding novel strengthened the belief that to no other pen than his could they be justly attributed. Indeed, from the date of the publication of Mr. Adolphus's Letters te Richard Hober, (July, 1821, vide p. 32, supra,) the little skepticism on the subject which remained was chiefly Sectt's veracity. The authorship was denied by him,
—we refer not now to the equivocations and evasions which at the best were of but doubtful morality,—denied absolutely and "upon honour," (see Scott's Introduc, to Waverley Novels, ed. 1829; Moore's Memoirs, ii, 199, vi. 130; Warren's Miscellanies,-letter to S. Warren, 3d August. 1823; Table-Talk of Samuel Rogers, 1856.) For this inexcueable breach of truth he has, of course, excused .- for when did the offences of an eminent sinner lack apologists? but every one of such apologists, since the beginning of the world, has only recorded his own condemnation, and utterly failed to relieve the criminal for whom he injudiciously and immorally pleads. Let it once for all be understood by all that there can be no such thing as a justifiable falsehood: from the first lie which stains our annals—that of the Father of Lies in the Garden of Eden-to the lies at this moment passing on to the register of the Recording Angel, all have been evil and only evil. We gladly turn from a theme which our duty as a conscientious biographer forbade us to leave entirely unnoticed, -which our obligations to trath forbade us to notice otherwise. It is the surmise of the author of the Life of Scott (written by Robert Chambers) in Chambers's Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen, "that he kept the Waverley secret with such pertinacious closeness" because "unwilling to be considered as an author writing for fortune, which he must have thought something degrading to the baronet of Abboteford."

This supposition was pronounced by James Ballantyne, whose testimony on such a point will hardly be questioned, to be "admirably true." This ambition to questioned. To be "admirately true." Anis amoution to be the founder of a family, the chief of a great landed estate, proved, in the end, Scott's ruin. Previously to 1811 he had been in the habit of spending his summers at a villa called Ashesticl, on the banks of the Tweed, near Selkirk. Henceforth he devoted his literary gains -and they were of course enormous—to the transformstion of a newly-purchased farm-house, three miles from Melrose, into a Cothic castle, and the culargement of a territory of one hundred acres to a vast domain. There was much curiosity to behold the marvels which a lavish outlay of capital, guided by architectural taste and agri-cultural skill, had wrought at Abbotsford; there was much more to see and hear the lord of the manor, whose fame had now gone forth to all parts of the world where the language and letters of Britain were known and esteemed.

"It would hardly, I believe, be too much to affirm," says Mr. Lockhart, "that Sir Walter Scott entertained mader his roof, is the course of the seven or eight brilliant seasons when his properly was at its height, as many persons of distinction is rank, in politics, in art, in literature, and in science, as the most princely nobleman of his age ever did in the like space of time. I turned over, since I wrote the preceding sentence, Mr. Lodge's compendium of the British Peerage, and, on summing up the titles which suggested to myself some reminiscence of this kind, I found them hearty subme out of six. I fame to be possible to the summing of the summing of the summing sup the summing the summing supplies that the summing supplies the summing supplies the summing supplies the summing supplies that the summing supplies the summing the many to add, that of the eminent foreigners who visited our Island within this period a molety crossed the Channel mainly in consequence of the interest with which his writings had invested Scotland,—and that the hope of beholding the man under his own roof was the crowning motive with half that molety. As for countrymen of his own, like him encolled, in the higher sense of that word, by the display of their intellectual energies, if any one such contemporary can be pointed out as having crossed the Tweed and yet not spent a day at Abbutsford, I shall be surprised."—Life of Scott, chap. xiix.

Among the most favoured of these guests were several of our own countrymen. One of these, who has recorded in his own charming pages his experience of Abbotsford hospitality, (vide Inving, Washington, p. 938,) and two others, have been so kind as to place in our hands some interesting reminiscences of their pilgrimage to the shrine of genius.

"Dea Sis:—I had the happiness to make the acquaintance of Walter Scott in the summer of 1818, just before the appearance of The Heart of Mid-Lothian. The authorship of the Waverley Novele had not then been announced. Mr. Lockhart states that it was known at this time to none of his family but Mrs. Scott, though it appears from a letter given in the 6th chapter of Mr. Lockhart's blography that it had been communicated to a few friends. I had armised it from the first appearance of Waverley, and on reading the Antiquary I felt confident that they could have proceeded from no other nen but Scotts. I carried him a letter from Mr. Gifford, the celebrated translator of Juvenal, and editor at that time of the Quarterly Review. Feeling the fullest confidence that I was about to visit not only the author of those invintable poems which from their first appearance had bean my great delight, but also the still-concessed author of these invintable poems which from their first appearance had bean my great delight, but also the still-concessed author of the wonderful novels, it was with no ordurary emotion that I found myself on the docratep of No. 39 Castle Street. It was the first visit I made after arriving in Edinburgh, and that after a long night's drive in the unit-couch. A brassy plate on the door bere the words 'Mr. Walter Scott, Advocate.' I was shown into the study so well known by the description given of it by Mr. Lockhart, whose first acquaintance with the family took place a few weeks before my visit. Scott's appearance, the tall, somewhat guant form, dusky-white hair, rather heavy look except when kinding with excitement, plain, farmor-like person, and lameness in one leg, are too familiar to need description. He received ma with much kindiness, and told me Mr. Gifford had prepared him to expect me. He said the society of Edinburgh differed from that of London, and. The first plant is the state of the Lake in 180, as I was travellin

It had a Latin legend, beginning, 'Jacobe, pacis alumpe.' On taking my leave, he invited me to dine with him that day, and to visit him at Abbotsford.

"I returned to dumer at 5 P.M., when I was made acquainted with the family.—Mrs. Scott, the two sons, Walter and Charles, and two daughters, Sophia and Aune. There were also a lady and gentleman whose names I do not recall. It was an uncommon family party, and I was made to feel myself at once entirely at home. Walter, the oldest son, and apparently a young man of 18 or 19, asked his father's permission to go to the theatre after dinner, which the father withheld. 'Young America' will be shocked at such an instance of fluid entirliners and parentla authority. When Anne, the second daughter, a black-eyed lassis of fourieon or fifteen, came in, there was no chair vacant near hor, and I rose to give her mine. Her father playfully sald, 'Dun't mind her; she's a fine buxom lasse, able to take care of herself.' The conversation round the table was delightful—nareatrained, merry, without effort. An original portrait of Rob Boy, jum., abunt eighteen inches high, was handed round the table. Scott had borrowed it to have it copied. No allusion was minde to the more: but in the course of the conversation Soott said that Helen McGregor had composed a piece of music. The father of the lady present had received a message from Rob Boy, jua., threatening to burn the house. It was impossible not to consider the interest taken by Scott in this portrait, his familiarity with the readition of Helen McGregor, and the absence of all allusions to the novel, in any other light but as indications of the yet wasvowed anthorship. Had not Scott hee the author of Rob Roy, It would naturally have formed the principal topic of conversation. All the persons present spoke with the usual Scottib inflection, but used no words peculiar to North Britain, with the exception, perhaps, of 'ye' for 'yon,' and 'mind' for 'remember.' There' were three dogs at table. A large favourite eat dome on with the the plunder of Paris? He said the duke was because on prine cople, but not naturally a man of keen sensibility.

"After tea, Sophia Scott, afterwards Mrs. Luckhart, sang several national ballads with great simplicity and feeling.

"A short time afterwards I spents few days—some of the happiest in my life—at Abbotsford. I carried down with me the first copy of The Heart of Mid-Lothian which had been seen by the family. At that time there was a pretty common notion that Mr. Thomas Scott, a brother of Sir Walter, and a paymaster (I think) at Quebec, was the author in whole or in part of some at least of the novels. I had lately made a visit at Kinnelli House, the residence of Dugald Stewart, and Mrs. Stewart related to me some ancolors of Thomas Scott which gave countenance to that opinion. She thought there might be some foundation for it. After I had become sufficiently at home at Abbotsford to talk freely on the subject, I said jokingly to Sophia that, after all, Amenica was entitled to the credit of the novels; 'fur,' said I, 'people say your uncel Thomas at Quebec writes them.' She answered, very quickly and warmly, that if people said that they said what was not true. 'Oh, then,' said I, 'the secret is out, and your father is the author.' Struck with the vehemence and warmth of her manner, she answered, 'Your inference is a fair one from my exclamation; and I ought in candor to tell you that we all believe that our father is the author; but we do not know it.' I asked her how it was possible that such an operation should be going on in the house as the composition and correcting the press of so many volumes and the family with whom he lived on such familiar terms not be aware of it. She said things occasionally took place that might awaken suspicion; that if they chose to be inquisitive they might perhaps with whom he is a on such familiar terms not be aware of it. She said things occasionally took place that might awaken suspicion; that if they chose to be inquisitive they might perhaps find out how the case stood; they believed their father wrote the novels, and that he desired it to remain concealed, and they respected his supposed wishes too much to pryinto the matter. Besides, said she, 'my father has always written a great deal, and there has been no change in his habits since I have been old enough to notice them.'

and there has oven no change in his moore enter I have seem old enough to notice them."

"It would swell unduly this already too long letter to attempt even an abstract of my recollections of this most delightful visit. In taking my last long walk with Sir Walter and his most amiable family, the thought that I should probably never see him again, filled me with sadness. On my return to England, in 1841, but one of the family was living. I had received in 1858 in America a letter from Charles Scott, written from Persia, where he was attached to the British legation. But a few years later all were gone. Miss Lockhart, the daughter of Sophia, gentle and beautiful as I had known her mother twenty-four years before, was just coming into society in London in 1842; but she too, with her father, has since passed away.

"The foregoing is, I fear, hardly adapted for publication; but, just as it is, it is at your service.

"I remain, dear sir, very truly yours,

"WALTER SCOTT.

"Walter Scott.

"Buring the winter and spring of 1819, I passed some weeks at Edinburgh. Mr. Scott, not yet Sir Walter by a year, and not by eight years recognized as the author of Wavoriey, though generally believed to be such, was then lord of the ascendant in Scotch society, as he had long been, and as he continued to be mith list death. His health, however, at that period was by no means firm. He was suffering from a succession of illnesses which were called spasms in the stomach, or cramp, which prevented hun from being much in the world, or, in fact, being much abroad, except when he was in his Court, then in season, or when he was taking his long daily walk, which he always found important. On this account he was more than commonly willing to see his friends, and even strangers, at home, where he enjoyed more than his worsted lebure, or, at least, submitted to it. In this way I saw him not infrequently at 'Yoor No, 39,' as he used to call his house in Castle Street after he left it. I dined with him there very quietly severed times.

"He was not quite forty-eight years old, tall and striking in his figure,—full six feet in height, I think,—stout and well made. From the nalconformation of one of his feet, he stonged a little,—at least, that seemed to me the reason why he was somewhat prematurely bent;—and his features bore the marks of coning age, which, like his gray hairs, had, I was told, much increased during the two proceding years. His contenance, as everybody knows, was dull when at rost, and even in comment conversation. I think it expressed only much good nature, and a remarkable willingness to listen; but his smile was uncommonly sweet and winning, and when he repeated postry, which he loved to do, there was a transfiguration of his features which seemed to change their expression entirely. His deep, bluish-gray eyes, or rather the white portions of them, blushed and became pink with his emotion,—an effect I have noticed in only a few other instances, and those in persons who possessed much sens few rhysics, and, after several efforts, both gave up to despetement stying, 'Well, John, it is clear you and I were never made for poets! To his early story-telling propagatiles, however, there bors ample testimony. They had both bees at it he ligh School together, and though Scott did not much distinguish himself in his Greek and mathematics, yet as soon as they came out into the 'yards' the boys used to gather round him, near a portion of the well where Scott liked to at, and bog him to telt them a story. His resources seemed inexhaustible; has own imagination supplied a large part of them. Sometimes his audience consisted of twenty or thirty.

"Of his extraordinary memory I had many proofs; but there was one which surprised me more than the rest. I was them fresh from Spain, and Mr. Scott was carious about whatever related to that remarkable country, its people and literature, and especially about whatever related to the endy poetry. Onday, after dunner, when the conversation, under his leading, had been upon these subjects, he reposted to me English translations of two long Spanish ballads. They were annually well done, and I naturally asked him where I could find them. He replied that they had never been printed. Its made me auspect that they were his own, and led me to some further inquiries about them, intending, if I could properly do so, to get a copy. Of course my curnosity was still further excited; and at last he told me that they were translations by Hoekham Frere, who had read thout to him; 'but,' he added, 'never so fine that I made him read then to me two.' Frere, it will be remembered, had an extraordnary power in this way, and a great love for early poetry. Mackintosh calls him the first of English translations. In consequence of this convenienton about the old Spanish hallads, I set Mr. Scott a note containing some facts about the Romanceros, &c., to which I received the following answer:

"DEAR SIR:

"Dear Sin:—
"I have to return you my very best thanks for your most valuable information respecting the Spanish Romanceros. I fear I shall never be able to belour much more in this vinevard, but I am delighted to see the task which I once pursued enthusiastically taken up by such intelligent and able successors.

"I am at present in such ticklish leadth from a tendency to stomach after tions, that I can only see very small parties of my friends. But if I can tempt you to a quiet dimer on to morrow, or any day before the 10th, excepting only the 5th, I will promise you a highland pibroch, a pair of ptaringains, and a hearty welcome.

Yours, thiry obliged, "Walter Scott."

"The dinner, with its piper, it is needless to say, was agreeable. Nobody was added to the family, I think, but Mr. Thomas Thomson, the well-known antiquary, and one other person.

The dinner, with its piper, it is needless to say, was agreeable. Notody was added to the tanuity, I thusk, but Mr. Thomas Thomson, the well-known antiquary, and one other person.

"On another occasion Mr. Scott awited me to dine with him, and accompany him and his family to the theatre and see a play called Rob Roy. It was not, as Lockhart suggests, the first representation. On the contrary, it had already been acted many times, with great success, and Mr. Scott's family, or at least some of them, had seen it; but he had been too unwell. Mackay, who died only eight or ton years ago, and who was long known as a remarkable notor, was then beginning to be famous, and performed the part of Bailhe Nichol Jarvie, as both Lockhart and Scott himself have noticed, with immittable felicity, at this period, a great number of times in Edinburgh, as he afterwards did still oftener in London. The lock which Mr. Scott had taken was not far from the stage, so that it could be seen by most of the house; and his presence was evidently noticed and his features watched by many of the audience, especially those in the pit near us. He protected himself a little from their attention, at first, by placeing himself lehind a small pillar; but, as the piece advanced, he became so much interested that he leaned forward eagerly, and became very noticestle. Two or three times he objected to the default of Mackay's acting; but, upon the whole, he enjoyed it produgicusly, and, when it was over, said to me, 'That's fine, sir—that's very fine; adding, with the peculiar Scotch look which he sometimes wore,—lalf sly, wholly humorous.—and all I wish is that Jedediah Cleish-bottam could be here to enjoy it.' He evidently did not intend I should doubt who wrote the novels.

"One day, as I was walking up and down in that Ratel, the great hall of the Parliament House, a sort of fashionable exchange at that time, where four courts were transacting business on the sides of the immense room, amidst a confusion which seemed to make it perfectly absurd to outbreaks of enthusiasm, yet remarkable for a cort of cause lact, which was, I think, very much to her father's inste. The played on the harp, perhaps not very well, and she sang, without having a volce of great compase or power; but she confined herself, so far as I heard her, almost entirely to the unitenal nunic and the old hallads, and in these was as successful as a fitlyl, with not a little of a fibyl's sir and character. It was like improvisation, so speciatuous did it seem.

"Once, as she was playing, she was a little ombarrasted. Lady Humeasked her to play an old hallad of Rob Roy. Several persons were present, and she was an successful as a fitlyl fluth of the adventured by the recollection of the way in which her father's maine had been associated with the adventures of this extraordinary Highander. But (as, I suspect, on all occasions) she took the nost threet means to bettle her difficulty. She ran across the room to her father, and whispered to him. 'Yes, my dear,' he replied, toud enough to be heard by those near him; 'Judy it, it you am asked, and Warerley, and the Antiquary, too, if there are any such lashing,' "As the spring came on, there was a vacation in the Court of which Mr. Scott was clerk, and he went, as it this was his catom, to Albotsford, taking only his daughters with him, and leaving the soms in town for their schools with Mrs. Scott. He was good enough to sak me to visit him there, and invited my friend Mr. Cogned it to goat the same time, in a way which much gratuled me. A tow days afterwards, I received the following note from him, accompanied by a copy of the Roxburgh Catalogue, which he had promised me, and a copy of 'Krik's Secret Commonwealth,'a can ions tract, of about a hundred quarto pages, on Fairs Superations and Second Sight, originally published in 1601, and of which, in 1815, Mr. Scott had caused a hundred copers to be privately printed by the Ballantynes, with additions,—a cheumatune, and a rare-tract which I published a small impression of some time ago, and which ine inserty to add a rare tract which I believe is already RR. I hope you have not forgotten the proposed visit on Tweedside, "Yer, truly,"

"We left Edinburgh soon afterwards, (March 15.) in beautiful weather, with the spring will advanced, and every thing beginning to be green. We stopped the first anglet at below, and then, not forgetting the Duke of Roxburgh's seat of Flores, or Thomeson's birthdace at Ednam, or Bry burgh Abboy, where Seath himself has since been buried, we drove along the grade, graces but banks of the Tweed, by Melioss, to Abbotsford. As we approached it, the positillon, who knew where we was going, painted it out to us, with great glee, as "the Sherfees," because Mr. Scott was then Sheriff of the county of Sekhrik, and, like his other neighbors, the postillon was prond of him and of his official postillo to them. It was not far from the road; and a very cold-tooking cetablishment it was,—indither collage nor house, neither ancient nor modern, nor an imitation of any thing like either, but a complete nondescript, begun upon the foundation of a cottage, and growing gradually up by successive additions to become nobody could tell what. The situation was not very good, for it was under a hill, and with very little prospect on either side; but it was within sound of the Tweed's ripple, which Scott always so loved, and opposite the entrance of the Gala, on whose banks he had lived so happily soon after he was married. Bur, whatever its at rangements night be, they suited him, and always continued to do so. But when, eighteen years afterwards, I reached the top of the same hill, coming again from Melrose, and looked down upon the strange castellated massion which Abbatsbord had become, I saw at a glance, though nod without a sharp pany, what its master had secrificed to found the 'Scott of Abbatsbord,' and how that ill-contrived structured, pleasant person. Mr. Scott was more smalling in the country than he had been in town. He seemed, like whom Mr. Scott had dedicated one of the canion of Marm as we walked on, he seemed to have a story for every stone on his estate; and for the great points in the prospect—like 'the Bildon that were cisft in twain'—he had a plenty of traditions, or a snatch of an old ballad, which he gave with great satisfaction and an appropriate commentary.

"One day, as we were going through a large field, where there were several horses straying about, Maida, who, with two or three other dogs of lower degree, belonged to the party, placed kimself on a little knoll, in a poculiarly picturesque position. As I noticed it, Mr. Scott asked me why I supposed Maida had placed himself there? I had no conjecture to make. Mr. Scott explained that it was a sort of commanding position, where the magnificent dog could, if needful, protect as from the horses or provent them from straying too near to us. 'He is as good as a man, I said. 'You may say as good as a gentleman,'Mr. Scott replied, 'and no injustice done to the quality.'

"When we returned from the morning walk, we went to our rooms. Perhaps more work was done on the 'Legend of Montrose;' perhaps not. I had no knowledge or suspicion of what might be going on. No reference was made to the novels while I was at Albotaford, except that when something was said about Mr. Thomas Scott, a border of Sr Walfer, then in Canada as paymaster of a regiment, Sophia added, with a little archness, 'Some people have thought flucte Tom,' however, as we now know from Lockhart, was thought by his brother to be equal to writing them, or something as good, and was asked by Mr. Scott 'to look knowing when Waverly is spoken of, atter he was arbitrosting and most vain, self-sufficient dogs I ever saw, who walked up and down, dressed in full Inghiand costume, and pibroch was struck up before the windows by the piper, one of the best-looking and most vain, self-sufficient dogs I ever saw, who walked up and down, dressed in full Inghiand costume, and played on his pipes, until the dessert arrived, making such a distressing noise that conversation was not easy. B

"There was great frankness in the whole family, and in the way they talked about one another. Mr. Scott said his great object with his children had been not to over-educate them, but to follow the natural indications of their characters rather than object with his children had been not to over-educate them, but to follow the natural indications of their characters rather than attempt to mould them. Charles, he thought, would make a 'writer to the signet,' or a lawyer. He was then only cleven years old, and had been permitted a few days before to come from Eduburgh alone on a pony; a distance, I think, of about eight-and-twenty miles. 'And what do you think,' said Mr. Scott,' pleased him best about it?' I supposed it was the independence of the position. 'No, 'said Mr. Scott sit was just paying the toils and taking care that he got the right change.' But Mr. Scott was disappointed in Charles. He died in a clerkship in the Foreign Office in London. Of Walter, then eighteen, he judged more accurately. He said that he did not foresee intellectual success for him, 'and so,' said he,' I have given him as much Latin as is good for him, and taught him to ride well, and shoot well, and tell the truth; and I timk he will make a good soldier, and seve his country well, instead of a poor scholar or salvoaste, doing no good to hieself or anythody else.' Sophia, however, did not seem to be sait-fied with her father's system of salucation in some respects; and, when he was gone out of the room, said, with her little Scotch idlom, 'He's always just felling we of our faults, but never taking such serious pains to have us mend. I think sometimes that he would like to have in different from other boys and girls, though it should be by having us est from other boys and girls, though it should be by having us

"Our pleasant visit was sadly ended on the third day. Late in the evening, Mr. Scott was seized with a violent spasm in his stomach. A surgeon was sent for immediately, who continued with him all night, vanily endeavoring to give hun relief by laudanum and bloeding. We sat up, as did Mr. Skene, retil near morning, and then, after breakfast, left abruptly,—a cay earlier than we had intended.
"At Oxford I found a letter from Mr. Skene, telling me that Mr. Scott was again better; but that the atrack had been very severe, and had filled the family for a time with the cruclest apprehanclons. I never saw him afterwards; but the letter from Mr. Skens was as follows:

" EDINO., 23 March, 1819.

 DEAD BYES:—
 Thoped sooner to have been able to fulfil my promise of informing you of the recovery of our friend Mr. Scott, who felt mach, gratified when I informed him of the very kind interest you took in his welfare. I romained with him until last night, when he had so far recovered as to quit his room during part of the day, and even to show somewhat of his almost invincible cheerfulness; though I cannot flatter myself that the disease is cubdued even for the present. He apprehends a return, and, I 1965 fear, with too much reason. He was tolerably easy the night after you left Abbotsford, but on the enceeding night was very, sharply visited by a return of spasms, accompanied with considerable inflammation, which occasioned a rapid extension of the pain over his breast, and was only arrested by bleeding. His physician from Edinbo., having heard of his attack, cause to Abbotsford immediately, and, I am happy to say, perfectly approved of every thing that had been done. The country surgeon received his instructions, and now remains almost constantly with Mr. Scott. I am sorry not to have a more favorable report to make; though I cannot but flatter myself that his naturally vigorous constitution will ultimately shake him free of the disease.

"He desires to express his regretat the unpleasant interruption occasioned to your visit, which deprived him of the enjoyment he had anticipated in your company; and, although you meditate a very distant separation, he trusts the chances of life may again give him the satisfaction of meeting with you. I beg to be permitted to express a similar wish on my part, and to subscribe myself, with much esteem,

Thus far Mr. Ticknor,-concerning whom Scott writes to Southey as follows:

"I shall like our American acquantance the better that he has sharpened your remembrance of me; but he is also a wondrous fellow for remembrance of me; but he is also a wondrous fellow for remembrance of me; but he is also a wondrous fellow for remembrance of me; but he is also a wondrous fellow for remembrance of me; but he is also a wondrous fellow for remembrance and written thus far hast week, when I was interrupted, first by the arrival of our friend Ticknor, with Mr. Cogswell, [p. 40], spra.] another well-accomplished Yankee," &c.—Lockhart & Scott, chap. xiv.

In his Autobiographical Recollections, 1860, chapter iv., U. R. Leslie gives us an interesting account of a visit paid to Abbotsford "in the autumn of 1824, for the purpose of painting a portrait of Sir Walter Scott for Mr. Ticknor, of Boston." Leslie's pen-and-ink portrait of Scott will be found on a later page of our sketch.

But the "brilliant seasons," as Mr. Lockhart well calls them, at Abbotsford, were to be followed by the dark days of adversity.

In the winter of 1825-26 a commercial crisis prostrated many houses, and among these were Messrs. Archibald Constable & Co., who carried on two establishments, one for printing and the other for publishing, and Messrs. Ballantyne & Co. To the astonishment of everybody not in the secrets of these concerns, it was ascertained that Scott was a partner of the last, and also in this capacity a large debtor to the creditors of the first, of these firms. It would appear that the embarrassments of Hurst & Robinson, another publishing house, precipitated the catastrophe which overwhelmed the three establishments in a common ruin. This mercantile connection had been, as his Diary, subsequently published, gives melancholy evidence, a source of painful anxiety to Scott. His partnership with James Ballantyne in the printing-business commenced in May, 1805; with John Ballantyne & Co., publishers, in May, 1808. To say the least, Constable and the Ballantynes had managed recklessly, and Scott had lavished foolishly. No biographer can do justice to this portion of Scott's history: fortunately, he has traced the sad annals in indelible lines in his only confidant,—the Diary of 1826; and from that record we shall borrow a few leaves:

record we shall borrow a few leaves:

"January 5.—Got the desired accommodation, which will put J. B. quite straight, but am a little anxious still about Constable, and the sacrifices to make to convert a large proportion of it into realy money. The accounts from London are most disastrous. Many weathy persons totally runned."

"January 14.—An odd, mysterious letter from Constable, who has gone poet to London. It strikes me to be that sort of letter which I Lave seen men write when they are desirous that their disagreeable intelligence should be rather apprehended than expressed. . . Luckly, the funny people are gone, and I shall onto have the task of grinning when I teel serious cough. A letter from J. B., mentioning Constable's journey, but without expressing much apprehension. He knows C. well, and saw bim before his departure, and makes no doubt of his being able easily to extricate whatever may be entangled. I will not, therefore, make myself uneasy. I can help doing so, surely, if I will . . . I see no crasson why one should not, with God's assistance, shun noxious thoughts, which foretell evil and cannot remedy it."

As Constable's plan of "extrication" was the negotia-

As Constable's plan of "extrication" was the negotiation of a loan from the Bank of England to the moderate amount of "£100,000 to £200,000 on the scenrity of the copyrights in his possession," it is no great marvel that "J. B.'s" confidence in his financial abilities was not justified by the result: Constable kept his "copyrights," and the Bank of England kept its money. The catastrophe could no longer be averted:

"Eithburgh, Jenuary 16.—Came through cold roads to as cold news. Hurst and Robinson have suffered a bill to come back upon Constable, which I suppose lufers the rain of ir th houses. We shall soon see. Dined with the Skenes."

"January 17.—James Ballantyne this morning, good, honest Sallow, with a vicage as black as the crock. He hopes no salvation; has indeed taken measures to stop. It is hard, after having fought such a lastie. . . My old acquaintance, Miss Bilisabeth Clerk, sister of Willie, died andslandy. I cannot chouse but wish it had been Sir W. S.; and yet the feeling is unspanly. I have Annie, my wife, and Charles to look after. I telt rather meaking as I came home from the Parliament Home,—felt as if I were liable monstrari digito in no very pleasant way. But this must be borne cus cateria; and, thank God, however uncomfortable, I do not feel despandent. . . My wife and daughter are gloomy, but yet patient."

"January 18.—He that sleeps too long in the morning, let him borrow the pillow of a debtor. So, anys the Spaniard, and so say I. I had, of course, an indifferent night of it. I wish these two days were over; but the worst is over."

It will be observed that Sir Walter fulfilled his engagement to dine at Skene's on the 16th of January, although ment to dine at Skene's on the 16th of January, although the news of the dreaded cutastrophe had just reached the news of the dreaded catastrophe had just reached him. Lockhart remarks,

"Mr. Skene assures me that he appeared that evening quite in his usual spirits, conversing on whatever topic was started as easily and gaily as if there had been no impending enhanity; but at parting he whispered, 'Skene, I have something to speak to you about: he so good as to look in on me as you go to the Parliament House to-emorrow.' When Skene called in Castle Street, about half-past nine o'clock, next morning, he found Scott writing in his study. He rose, and said, 'My friend, give me a sluke of your hand—mine is that of a leggar.' He then told me that Ballantyne had just been with him, and that his ruin was certain and complete; exp hining heirfly the nature of his connection with the three houses whose downfull must that morning he made public. He added, 'Don't faivy I am going to stay at home to brood idly on what can't be helped. I was at work on Woodstock when you came in, and I shall take up the pen the moment I get lack from court. I mean to dine with you again on Sunday, and hope then to report progress to some purpose.' When Sunday came, he reported, accordingly, that in spite of all the numberless interruptions of meetings and condenences with his partner, the Constables, and men of business—to say nothing of his distressing anxieties on account of his wife and daughter:'—slas' it was here that the "iron entered into his soul."

every intervening day."
"Distressing anxieties about his wife and daughter: alas! it was here that the "iron entered into his soul." It was this that bowed the strong man,-resolute, and

It was this that howed the strong man,—resolute, and even cheerful, under his own share of this great sorrow. "January 19.—A painful scene after dinner, and another after supper, endeavouring to convince those poor dear creatures that they must not look for mirales, but consider the miglestine as certain, and only to be lessened by patience and labour."

"January 21.—susannah, in Tristram Shandy, thinks death is beet net in bed. I am sure trouble and vexation are not. The watches of the night poss wearily when distinted by futiless regrets and disagreeable articipations. . . . Mr. Gibson with a most melancholy tale. Things are much worse with Constable than I apprehended. Naked we entered the world, and unked we leave it:—blessed be the name of the Lord!"

"January 22.—I fied neither dishonoured nor broken down by the bad—now really bad—news I have received. I have walked my last on the domains I have planted—sate the last time in the halfs I have built. But death would have taken them from me, if misfortine had spared them. My poor people, whom I loved so well! . . . But I find my eyes moletening; and that will not do. I will not yield willoud a fight for it. . . . Poor Mr. Pole, the harper, sent to ofter me ££60 or £600, probably his all. There is much good in the world, after all."

"Mr. Pole," comments Lockhart, "had long afterneded Sir Walter's daughters as teacher of the harp. To the end Scott always spoke of his conduct on this occasion as the most affecting circumstance that accompanied his disnaters."

And this, although an anonymous correspondent tenderal stream is a second of the most affecting circumstance that accompanied his disnaters."

And this, although an anonymous correspondent ten-dered him £30,000 down! Dalgleish, Sir Walter's butler, also gave a touching proof of his attachment to his master: he said he "cared not how much his wages were reduced, but go he would not!"

Sir James Mackintosh writes to Scott, (Feb. 7, 1826,)

"No man living has given pleasure to so many persons as you have done; and you must be assured that great multitudes who mever asseyou, in every quarter of the world, will regret the slightest disturbance of your convenience."

"The universal feeling," remarks Lockhart, "was, I believe, much what the late annable and accomplished Earl of Dudley expressed to Mr. Morritt when these news reached them at Brighton. 'Rout runned!' said he: 'the author of Wavvrley runned! Good God! let every man to whom he has given months of delight give him a sixpence, and he will rise to-morrow morning richer than Rothschild!"

row morning richer than Rollachild!"

We continue our extracts from the Diary:

"January 22.—I sm glad that beyond my own family, who are, excepting Lady 8., young and able to bear sorrow, of which this is the first taste to some of them, nost of the hearts are part aching which would have once been incomolable on this occasion. I do not mean that many will not seriously regret, and some perhaps lament, my misortunes. But my dear mother, my almost sister, Christy Rutherford, p.or Will Enakine,—these would have been mourners indeed! Well—exertion—exertion¹ O, invention, rouse thyself! May man be bind! may God be propitious!"

"January 23.—Siept ill, not having been abroad these eight days—splendids bilk. Then a dead sleep in the morning, and, when the awakening comes, a strong feeling how well I could dispense with it at once and forever. This passes away, however, as better and more dutiful thoughts arise in my mind."

"January 24.—I went to the Court for the first time to-day, and, like the man with the large near, thought sworphody was thinking of me and my mishaps. Many were, undestitedly; and all rather reprettingly, some obviously affected. It is singular to see the difference of men's manners whilst they strive to be kind or civil in their way of addressing me. Some unded as they where model as they where me with the affected gravity which one sees and despises at a funeral. The best-bred—all, I believe, meaning equally well-sjust shock hands, and went en!"
